1983

Book Review: MacGillivray and Parkington on Insurance Law Relating to All Risks other than Marine, Seventh Edition, by Michael Parkington, Anthony O'Dowd, Nicholas Legh-Jones and Andrew Longmore

Reuben Hasson
Osgoode Hall Law School of York University

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.osgoode.yorku.ca/scholarly_works

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Noncommercial-No Derivative Works 4.0 License.

Recommended Citation
d’interprétation fédérales et provinciales, la Charte de la langue française\(^3\) et la Loi sur les langues officielles\(^4\) font partie de ce volume. Ces lois sont réunies en cinq chapitres intitulés: Charte des droits de la personne, lois à l’information, lois linguistiques, lois d’interprétation et lois spéciales. Un avant-propos du professeur Denis Lemieux explique les raisons qui justifient le regroupement de ces lois.

Il ne fait nul doute que ce recueil constituera un instrument précieux dont l’usage pourra être judicieusement combiné avec les articles d’émis- nents juristes québécois et canadiens publiés récemment en un volume par les professeurs Beaudoin et Tarnopolsky.\(^5\) Nous pouvons toutefois regretter qu’il n’inclut pas des textes importants pour l’établissement des libertés en droit constitutionnel britannique qui sont difficiles à retracer comme la Magna Carta, le Bill of Rights et l’Act of Settlement.

Par ailleurs, pour le praticien, la version anglaise de ces lois aurait dû être reproduite pour fins de comparaison et d’interprétation. Il est vrai que la maison C.E.J. se distingue par l’édition de textes compactes et facilement accessibles; tous ses autres volumes ne sont aussi publiés qu’en langue française. Un tel document deviendra un spicilège de première nécessité pour tout juriste qui se préoccupe de la sauvegarde des droits et libertés de la personne.

Alain Cardinal*

* * *

This book is the best English practitioner’s book on the market. It is, beyond doubt, superior to Ivamy or to Colinvaux.

Yet the book has almost the look of a nineteenth century practitioner’s work. It is very heavily weighted in favour of case law. Astonishingly, the Policyholders Protection Act 1975,\(^1\) perhaps the most important piece of insurance legislation passed in the United Kingdom this century, goes

---

\(^3\) L.R.Q. 1977, c. C-11.

* Alain Cardinal. Avocat au Barreau de Montréal.

\(^1\) 1975, c. 75.
unmentioned. The Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977\(^2\) is given a bare mention and the provisions of the Insurance Companies Act 1981\(^3\) are only outlined. A division of insurance law into contractual and statutory parts is nothing short of antediluvian.

In the sixth edition, some reviewers had criticized MacGillivray for not dealing with the very important question of what is an insurance company\(^4\). In this edition, four pages are devoted to this topic but the discussion is almost worthless. Some English cases are summarized but the tests they lay down are so broad that they would cover most contracts. Reference to Professor Hellner’s classic article on the subject would have helped the authors\(^5\).

The chapter on insurable interest in property is set out comprehensively and with a great deal of historical learning. What is not pointed out is that the rules for deciding who has an insurable interest are irrational. Thus, to give but two examples:

1. an unsecured creditor has no insurable interest in property;\(^6\)
2. a \textit{bona fide} purchaser of a stolen good has no insurable interest in the stolen property.\(^7\)

The authors cite the “useful” article by Harnett and Thornton on insurable interest in property\(^8\) in a footnote\(^9\) but they fail to apply the central argument of that article, namely that the definition of insurable interest in property arbitrarily deprives many insureds of coverage.

In the chapter on agency, the outrageous decision in \textit{Newsholme Bros. Ltd v. Road Transport and General Assurance}\(^10\) is accepted without question. The very limited scope given to agents in terms of ostensible authority also passes without comment.\(^11\) Only the rule in \textit{Grover and Grover v. Matthews},\(^12\) which prevents a principal from ratifying after a loss is criticized.

\(^2\) 1977, c. 46.
\(^3\) 1981, c. 31.
\(^4\) See \textit{e.g.}, the review by Professor R.M. Goode (1977), 93 L.Q.Rev. 458.
\(^5\) See this article, \textit{The Scope of Insurance Regulation: What is Insurance for the Purposes of Regulation?} (1963), 12 Am. J. of Comp. L. 494.
\(^7\) See \textit{e.g.}, \textit{Chadwick v. Gibraltar Insurance} (1981), 34 O.R. (2d) 488.
\(^9\) P. 20, n. 14.
\(^10\) [1929] 2 K.B. 356 (C.A.).
\(^11\) See \textit{e.g.}, \textit{Comerford v. Britannic Assurance Co.} (1908), 24 T.L.R. 593 and the cases cited at p. 397, n. 41.
\(^12\) [1910] 2 K.B. 401.
There is some mild criticism of the scandalous state of the law with regard to the duty of disclosure but in the end the authors would retain the doctrine. They write in defence of the duty of disclosure:

In the first place, cover is sometimes obtained over the telephone without the protection of the proposal form and its warranties. Secondly, there must be occasions when the risk is quite definitely affected by a circumstance which was outside the scope of the most thorough proposal form—the house next door was only recently on fire or is thatched, or for that matter, the life assured develops serious symptoms after the proposal form is sent off, but before the premium is paid. It cannot be said, in our view, that the doctrine of non-disclosure is otiose.

Once one requires an insured to disclose the fact that his neighbour’s house has a thatched roof or that he has had a recent fire, then this leaves the law precisely where it is today.

The authors do not find it strange that the insurer owes the insured no duties of disclosure. Thus, an insurer does not have to tell the beneficiary of the existence of a life insurance policy after the insured has died; nor, does it have to tell the insured the price of his or her insurance. This seems more than a little unfair.

Finally, in their chapter on subrogation, the authors spend a considerable amount of time on the history of subrogation but there is no mention of the fact that the doctrine has been criticised as being wasteful because it shifts losses from one insurer to another at great expense. The authors are a little troubled by the decision of the House of Lords (a decision which they regard as ‘‘inescapable’’) in Lister v. Romford Ice. This, they say, should be a matter ‘‘for legislation in the context of industrial relations as a whole’’. But legislation abolishing subrogation in the field of employers’ liability insurance alone would still leave many employees in the same position as the defendant in the Lister case. The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Greenwood Shopping Plaza v. Beattie\textsuperscript{21} is confirmation of that fact.

It might be argued that I am being unrealistic and unfair in requiring a practitioners’ book to adopt a critical stance but it should be remembered that Corbin and Wigmore were (and are) legal classics precisely because they adopted a critical point of view.

REUBEN HASSON*

\textsuperscript{21} (1980), 111 D.L.R. (3d) 257.

* Reuben Hasson, of Osgoode Hall Law School, York University, Toronto.

\textsuperscript{1} (1975)

\textsuperscript{2} (1979)

\textsuperscript{3} (1981)