The Failure of the Canadian Human Rights Regime to Provide Remedies for Indigenous Peoples: Enough Time Has Passed

Jeffery Gordon Hewitt

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.osgoode.yorku.ca/llm
Part of the Human Rights Law Commons, and the Indian and Aboriginal Law Commons

Recommended Citation
http://digitalcommons.osgoode.yorku.ca/llm/22

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by the Theses and Dissertations at Osgoode Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in LLM Theses by an authorized administrator of Osgoode Digital Commons.
THE FAILURE OF THE CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS REGIME TO PROVIDE REMEDIES FOR INDIGENOUS PEOPLES: ENOUGH TIME HAS PASSED

JEFFERY GORDON HEWITT

A THESIS SUBMITTED TO THE FACULTY OF GRADUATE STUDIES IN PARTIAL FULFILLMENT OF THE REQUIREMENTS FOR THE DEGREE OF MASTERS OF LAW

GRADUATE PROGRAM IN LAW OSGOODE HALL LAW SCHOOL YORK UNIVERSITY TORONTO, ONTARIO

December, 2015

© Jeffery Gordon Hewitt, 2015
ABSTRACT:

In 2008, Canada amended the Canadian Human Rights Act to remove s.67, which in essence precluded Indigenous Peoples from bringing complaints as against Canada and Band governments. Since the amendment took effect in 2010, a multi-fold increase has occurred in the number of complaints filed with the Human Rights Commission of Canada from dozens to hundreds. The first such significant complaint to be heard by the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal was filed by the First Nation Child and Family Caring Society along with the Assembly of First Nations (the Complaint). The Complaint alleges Canada’s funding with respect to First Nation child welfare services on-reserves is discriminatory and a service that falls within the meaning of the CHRA. Canada has aggressively denied any discrimination and challenged the Tribunal’s jurisdiction. The Complaint seeks not only equality with respect to funding but also systemic remedies to address the socio-economic gap that exists between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Peoples in Canada. In addition to examining the Canadian human rights regime, this thesis explores ongoing colonialism in relation to Indigenous Peoples and how colonialism assists in maintaining the status quo. Will Indigenous Peoples with complaints before the Tribunal be able to access meaningful systemic remedies from a Tribunal, which itself derives authority from Canada’s colonialist root? If so, what might such remedies look like? This thesis also posits that in addition to ordering substantive equality of funding for child welfare services, in crafting meaningful systemic remedies the Tribunal should make room for and access Indigenous laws in order to both narrow the socio-economic gap and provide access to culturally relevant child welfare services.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This is the most impossible part to write. Here, I cannot reference the well-chosen words of scholars nor draw upon the work of others and weave it into my own thinking as I have throughout this thesis. I am left solely to my own devices. The idea that I could dedicate the time and energy to this project seemed merry enough at conception (as is so often the case at the time immediately prior to conception), and was generously supported by both Dean Lorne Sossin and Professor Dayna Scott, to whom I am indebted in many ways. I also thank Professor Bruce Ryder for his thoughtful insights into early drafts. In addition, there were so many others who offered up bushels full of support, love, understanding, patience, courtesy, kindness, sharing, time, attention, laughter, nudging through my questions, queries, gut-clenching anxiety and dull headaches. You know who you are. You will be glad to know, it is finally done and I will stop bothering you.

I thank my committee – which includes Professor Ruth Buchanan as Chair, Professors Angela Cameron, Dean Lorne Sossin and Professor Sonia Lawrence – for their time and review of my work, which helped make it better and who were intellectually generous with me.

In particular, upon meeting Professor Sonia Lawrence, I knew for the moments of uncertainty, which would surely come, I had found someone who would tell me when it was time to stop eating chips and get writing. I am deeply grateful for Professor Lawrence’s contributions and in particular her unparalleled editing notes.

Sometimes life deals us a good hand and when it does, my response has been to clutch it tightly. So it is with Professor John Borrows, who offered support, feedback and friendship that springs from a deep well of trust. There were flashes where I was certain this was all a lark and if I pulled the covers over my head long enough the stacks and gigabytes of research would disappear, as though it was all a bad dream. The piles remained firmly entrenched and stubbornly refused to go away. For these times, I had good friends who knew when to call or just spontaneously show up.

During my work on this thesis the Chief of Rama First Nation has changed to Chief Rodney Noganosh (formerly Councillor), from Sharon Stinson-Henry. Byron Stiles retired from Council. Councillor Ron Douglas, Gina Genno, Tracey Snache, and Nemke Quarrington were reelected. Ted Williams and Ted Snache were both elected to Council.
Each of them, along with the First Nation Manager, Daniel Shilling, my Assistant Audrey Bubel, Cathy Edney and many others have been supportive, patient and kind while I was off working on this thesis, thank you. You have all taught me so much.

Then there is family and I thank them all for without them (namely my parents), I would not be possible (let alone this thesis). My spouse has an uncanny ability to know when to let me work until my eyes are blurry and when to insist on adventure (not to mention superb editorial skills). My children have been unbelievably patient and tolerant – amused even – by the comings and goings of what it has taken to pull this thesis together. My family have been not only tolerant but embracing of this journey because I have attempted to explain I am trying to make some contribution, however small, to the world that they will inherit, so when I am not it is for good reasons. Now that it is completed, I hope this thesis was a good reason. It feels like it.

Not everyone who started this journey with me is here for the big reveal. In the winter of 2014, Rama First Nation lost a community member and culture-keeper, John Snake. I lost a friend, a guide and a teacher (among his gifts was to be these things to a lot of people). Many days my heart is still heavy. John guided me since we first met over fourteen years ago. He actively encouraged me to draw upon the laws of my people, the Cree, and those of the Anishinabe (whose are generous hosts and in whose lands we are raising our family). Though a gentle soul, John could be relentless in his expectations. He would not for a moment let me forget why I do what I do. We talked at length about what my research should be about, how I should dedicate my time and what this is all really for. As I finish this work, the thirteenth moon after his passing has come and gone. I hope now that we can visit in my dreams and I can tell him all about what I have written. I secretly hope it earns me a song?

To anyone whom I have forgotten to list on these pages, please know it is only in my words that I missed you, not in my heart.

Hai-hai.
THE FAILURE OF THE CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS REGIME TO PROVIDE REMEDIES FOR INDIGENOUS PEOPLES: ENOUGH TIME HAS PASSED

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Abstract...........................................................................................................................................ii
Acknowledgements.........................................................................................................................iii
Table of Contents...........................................................................................................................vi

CHAPTER 1 – TRUTH: THE GAP

Fire & Hummingbird.........................................................................................................................1
Guidance of the Seven Grandfathers...............................................................................................1
1.1 Thesis Roadmap ............................................................................................................................2
1.2 Considering Indigenous Laws and the Complaint.................................................................5
1.3 Changes to the Canadian Human Rights Act...........................................................................8
1.4 A Brief Summary of the Complaint..........................................................................................9
  1.4.1 Choosing Venue....................................................................................................................10
1.5 Methodology............................................................................................................................11
1.6 The (re)Flexibility of Canadian Human Rights.........................................................................16
1.7 The Gap: Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal Canadians.............................................................18
1.8 Indigenous Women & Children...............................................................................................21
1.9 On-Reserves & Housing............................................................................................................24
1.10 Some Conclusions....................................................................................................................26

CHAPTER 2 – RESPECT: (re)STRUCTURING COLONIALISM

How the Birch Got Its Marks..........................................................................................................29
2.1 A Road Map...............................................................................................................................30
2.2 The Master Narrative..................................................................................................................32
2.3 What Lurks Beneath Building Relationships & Settling Canada............................................35
2.4 Not Talking About Settler Colonialism....................................................................................37
  2.4.1 The Indian Act: An Instrument of Assimilation & Destruction........................................37
  2.4.2 Neil Stonechild.......................................................................................................................39
  2.4.3 Blind Inquiry..........................................................................................................................42
2.4.4 Lessons from Stonechild...............................................................45
2.5 Resisting the Master Narrative.........................................................48
2.6 Marks on Paper................................................................................51
   2.6.1 Overview..................................................................................51
   2.6.2 Canada & UNDRIP.................................................................52
   2.6.3 International Agreements in Domestic Courts............................57
2.7. The Canadian Human Rights Act Amendments & First Nations........60
   2.7.1 Collective, Government & Individual Rights...............................60
   2.7.2 Not Everyone Is In Favour of CHRA Amendments....................61
   2.7.3 CHRA Amendments & the Indian Act......................................62
   2.7.4 Leading Up to the CHRA Amendments....................................63
   2.7.5 Who Decides the Remedies? CHRA Appointment......................64
   2.7.6 Who Does Not Decide the Remedies? Non-Indigenous Appointments...65
2.8 Some Conclusions............................................................................66
   2.8.1 Returning to the Valley.............................................................67

CHAPTER 3 – HONESTY: CHILD & FAMILY CARING SOCIETY

Wesukechak & Weasel..........................................................................71
3.1 Overview..........................................................................................72
   3.1.1 Attacking Indigenous Laws Through Indian Residential School.....74
   3.1.2 Historical Disadvantage............................................................76
3.2 Nature of the Complaint & Legal Process.........................................76
   3.2.1 Overview..................................................................................76
   3.2.2 An Introduction to Potential Models of Remedy Structure............77
   3.2.3 Deny, Deny, Deny.................................................................79
   3.2.4 Canada’s Trickery and Flawed Logic.........................................80
   3.2.5 Let’s Try It Again and Get This Right.......................................82
   3.2.6 Retaliation and Trickery for Bearing Witness...............................84
   3.2.7 Making Room in Canada’s Laws for Indigenous Peoples to Bring Challenges........................................................................85
3.3 Human Rights, Indigenous Rights & Equality: Strategic Choices.........88
CHAPTER 1 – DEBWEWIN (TRUTH): THE GAP

*Fire & Hummingbird*¹

Once, before the people came, there was a great green forest with many well-worn paths from the animals visiting each other every day. In a barren land far away where nothing grew, there lived a tiny Spark. He was glum and lonely. One day, little Spark convinced South Wind to carry him away to the north where he could make friends. Feeling sorry for Spark, South Wind blew the little one to the great forest and left him resting on a leaf. Spark nestled in and ate the leaf. It felt good because while he ate, Spark changed. He became a flame. He was bigger, stronger and more powerful now but the forest was still so vast and he was so small. That will change soon, he thought. He jumped to the next leaf and the next – growing larger each time he ate. The transformation and power felt so good that Spark forgot all about being lonely and wanting to make friends. Being a flame was not enough either. He craved more. Soon, he grew so big he became Fire and consumed the whole tree, then the next and the next until the entire forest was alight and the forest-dwellers ran for their lives.

Guidance of the Seven Grandfathers

“Ojibway tradition tells us that there were Seven Grandfathers who were given the responsibility by the Creator to watch over the Earth’s people. They were powerful

---

¹ After some handwringing, I intentionally open with a story. I close with one too. I have heard the story of Fire & Hummingbird from a number of storytellers, the most recent of whom was David Bouchard, Metis storyteller and author who told the story in Rama First Nation. I have tried to set out the story the same as David Bouchard told it, though I have been taught that in Cree culture (Anishinabe too), stories are often told but not explained on the understanding that meaning is left to the listener to take in what is needed and leave what is not for someone else. This is what I heard.
spirits...Wisdom...Love...Respect...Bravery...Honesty...Humility...Truth.”

Though there are wise people who carry teachings on each of these Grandfathers that would fill volumes of books, I refer to the Seven Grandfathers as set out by Edward Benton Banai. For the purposes of this thesis, the Grandfathers provide a lens by which to consider the relationship between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians, human rights, reconciliation and remedies insofar as they form the basis of an Indigenous legal order – in this instance Anishinaabe – that is not as externally prescriptive as western legal orders but rather focuses on the internal. Why? As set out in this chapter, the socio-economic gap is vast and the relationship is frayed. Perhaps by the end of the thesis, the Grandfathers may assist in reflection on all the complications located within the Indigenous/Canada relationship and serve as guides to consider what comes next.

1.1. Thesis Roadmap

In this thesis, I consider the possibilities for law in closing the socio-economic gulf between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Peoples in Canada. Overall, I examine the value of the Canadian human rights process as a potential vehicle for change – and in particular investigate a complaint before the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal filed by 3 Among other contributions, Edward Benton-Banai is of the Fish Clan (intellectuals clan), and is currently the Grand Chief of the Three Fires Medewiwin Lodge. I have been fortunate enough to meet him on occasion and hear him speak and like all good teachers, every time I leave further enriched in some way. The last interaction was in Rama First Nation in 2014 as I prepared for this work when we discussed using the Seven Grandfathers as a means to provide context for my thesis’ chapters as was previously suggested to me by John Snake, then Culture Advisor for Rama First Nation.

---

4 The Anishinaabe are a nation of Indigenous Peoples that includes the Three Fires Confederacy and whose traditional territory covers much of Ontario across to parts of Manitoba. My family and I live in Anishinabe territory and are grateful for the Anishinaabe hosting us and reminding us every day what it means to share. In both Cree and Anishinaabe legal orders I have been taught that we must follow the laws of the land within which we live. As such, I am grateful to the many Anishinaabe teachers who continue to school me in Anishinaabe law (and of course, those to also teach Cree law).

the First Nation Family and Child Caring Society and Assembly of First Nations (the “Complaint”). On first blush, the Complaint is about alleged discrimination in relation to funding for child welfare services of First Nation children on-reserves. But it is also about so much more. The Complaint raises complicated issues. This thesis considers direct links between the funding of child welfare for First Nation children and Canada’s coloniser history – such as the Indian Act and the Indian Residential Schools program.

Moreover, the landscape with respect to human rights in Canada is changing. Since the 2008 amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act, (the “CHRA”), which took effect in 2010, there has been a sharp rise the number of complaints before the Canadian Human Rights Commission brought by Indigenous Peoples and groups. The Caring Society’s Complaint is the first to proceed and holds tremendous possibilities to set strong precedent and assist in recalibrating the relationship between Indigenous Peoples and the Crown – particularly with so many other complaints waiting to proceed before the Tribunal. Can Indigenous Peoples expect the umbrella of human rights to address the underlying systemic issues arising from the ongoing violence of colonialism? Can human rights really offer meaningful remedies?

This thesis comprises five chapters. In Chapter 1, I set out various numbers and data that are meant to provide a common understanding of what I mean by the socio-7 At the time of writing the complaint has been heard, including closing submissions, though no decision has been released. Regardless, it is widely expected that no matter the outcome, a challenge to the decision will be brought. If granted, there may be further opportunity for the Courts to either uphold or reconsider the decision in light of the principles of Indigenous laws introduced to the Tribunal relating to children. A new federal government has formed as well, which may - or may not - signal change in Canada’s responses to date in relation to the Complaint.

---

economic gap,\(^8\) because the numbers tell as story. Stories matter. To that end, I have included Indigenous stories in each of the chapters to provide another lens through which to consider law. But there is another story that aids in supporting the vast socio-economic gap too. In Chapter 2, I examine Canada’s master narrative – a well-crafted story from the early days of colonization, which in essence advances the view that Indigenous Peoples are subjects of the Crown. Canadian law has been complicit in solidifying the country’s master story, which leads me to examine whether Indigenous Peoples might really be able to access justice through a human rights complaints process that was founded on a legal order that excludes the laws of Indigenous Peoples.

In Chapter 3 I explore human rights in the Canadian context. I focus on the Complaint – along with both the meaning of substantive equality and the role of section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as it may relate to Indigenous Peoples. I also engage in a broader discussion as to how the United Nations Declaration of the Rights of Indigenous Peoples may be a vehicle for both resistance and change.

Chapter 4 considers how efforts to engage with Indigenous laws – though not necessarily utopian – may offer new remedial possibilities and given Canada’s penchant for taking First Nation children for generations, suggests a supervisory role of the Tribunal in order to promote the sustainable creation of culturally relevant First Nation child welfare services. Chapter 5 offers some conclusions in relation to the Canadian human rights system, as well as with the relationship between Canada and Indigenous Peoples.

\(^8\)There are many numbers, statistics, data and reports that contribute to explaining the socio-economic gap that are not included in this thesis because they are beyond the scope – though are also important.
Ultimately, I hope to show that though the Complaint relates to First Nation child welfare, the hearing within the human rights process is also a site of colonialism in action. The dual narratives of the substantive Complaint and ongoing colonialism – or specific and broad actions – are impossible to disconnect. I also seek to assert the point that when it comes to systemic remedies it is vitally important to engage with Indigenous laws and Indigenous Peoples because neither Indigenous laws nor Peoples are the problem but part of the solution. The question remains whether we want to recognize this Complaint as a lever to address colonialism within human rights and use effective, systemic remedies to narrow the socio-economic gap. As to this, I also hope to demonstrate how the Tribunal might consider Indigenous legal principles, such as those found within the stories I offer in this thesis. I set out the stories as a means to push against colonization enough to possibly guide meaningful systemic remedies. I posit that if well crafted, systemic remedies can begin to close the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians.

1.2 Considering Indigenous Laws & The Complaint

Attention to revitalizing Indigenous\(^9\) laws within Canadian legal scholarship is a relatively new phenomenon.\(^{10}\) Drawing Indigenous laws meaningfully into Canadian courts and tribunals, however, is a wall yet to be scaled.\(^{11}\) Legal scholars and the \(^9\) As often as possible, I seek to be specific in the use of language. The terms “First Nations,” “Aboriginal Peoples,” “Indigenous Peoples,” “Native Peoples,” and “Indian” in varying ways refer to descendants of the original inhabitants of the North American continent, including Inuit and Métis. For example, when discussing a human rights complaint specifically addressing First Nation children, I use the term “First Nation”. When discussing remedies in relation to both the Complaint and considerations to broader relationships I sometimes use the broader terms “Aboriginal Peoples” or “Indigenous Peoples”.

---

\(^{11}\) The query has also been considered as to whether climbing a wall built upon colonial foundations in an effort to bring Indigenous law into the Canadian legal system is a quest that should be undertaken. It raises another set of
Supreme Court of Canada have begun to craft an invitation for considering how Indigenous laws might be engaged with Canadian jurisprudence.\(^\text{12}\)

Laws already exist within Indigenous Nations that illustrate how legal pluralism exists in Canada.\(^\text{13}\) Consider the stories set out in each chapter of this thesis. How we relate to stories matter, which is why the Seven Grandfathers have also been brought in. They might help us find connections through the process of both learning the stories (or law) and how to apply such laws to the elements set out in this thesis. The thesis itself is meant to demonstrate possibilities in relating to and applying Indigenous laws. Some stories may also be useful not only for the arguments contained in them, but also with respect to remedies aimed at closing the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Peoples. If we are going to make remedies that matter then the Seven Grandfathers might form the foundation by which we determine the outcomes we seek and work our way backward to craft an appropriate remedy. Establishing a connection between Indigenous laws and how they may be used to close the socio-economic gap is not a panacea. The best systemic remedies will not necessarily eliminate poverty but will hopefully seek to counter the effects of colonialism. The application of Indigenous laws alone will not be enough. It also requires political will along with appropriate levels of sustained funding.

\(^{13}\) J. Borrows, Recovering Canada: The Resurgence of Indigenous Law (University of Toronto Press, Toronto, 2002).
Forcing Canada’s laws onto Indigenous Peoples has been tried. It fails time and again. As we will see, the numbers of Indigenous Peoples entangled with Canadian law continues to rise the more we apply it. I argue that drawing upon Indigenous laws to substantively acknowledge and address colonialism and the systemic issues that sustain the socio-economic gap is necessary to create a long-term healthy partnership between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians.

Increasingly, Canadian tribunals are engaged with issues, which involve Indigenous parties; issues relating to treaty rights; the Crown’s duty to consult and accommodate; and self-government agreements.14 Administrative law decision-making, such as environmental review panels,15 the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal,16 energy and transportation boards, and committees arising from self-government agreements,17 are typically possessed of wide mandates within their respective enabling statutes.18 Do broader inquiry powers translate into more opportunity for the expansion of Indigenous laws? Are tribunals able to more freely draw upon Indigenous laws alongside Canadian law and create something that is neither purely based in common and civil law traditions nor Indigenous laws but is rather something uniquely Canadian, something

15 National Energy Board Act, RSC 1985, c N-7
17 For a discussion on the relationship between First Nation so-called self-government agreements and administrative law see Sossin, supra at note 14; for a current example of administrative law operating within a First Nation from powers arising out of self-government agreements see the Nisga’a Lisims Government/Wilp Si’ayukhl Nisga’a Nisga’a Administrative Decisions Review Act.
18 For a general discussion on administrative tribunals and broadening mandates in Canada, such as the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal’s authority to include Charter remedies, see D. Dyzenhaus, "Constituting the Rule of Law: Fundamental Values in Administrative Law," (2002). The National Energy Board may also be the exception to wide-mandates with its limited ability to address environmental protection matters – even when they relate to pipelines crossing First Nation lands, see: Chippewas of the Thames First Nation Granted Leave by Federal Court of Appeal Line 9 Approval, http://www.chiefs-of-ontario.org/node/883.
‘intersocietal’?\textsuperscript{19} Are tribunals able to create remedies aimed at closing the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians?

\textbf{1.3 Changes to the Canadian Human Rights Act}

The Complaint arises from changes to the \textit{Canadian Human Rights Act} – namely the 2008 legislative amendment repealing section 67.\textsuperscript{20} Moreover, the Complaint serves as a test case in determining whether the Crown has engaged in a discriminatory practice in accordance with the provisions of the \textit{CHRA} and the extent to which the \textit{CHRA} would apply to Indigenous complaints. The Complaint may prove precedent setting for a growing number of other complaints by Indigenous Peoples against government. Beyond the technical issues, the complaint asks whether the section 67 amendment creates real opportunity for substantive change in the lives of Indigenous Peoples or is it merely more rhetoric meant to maintain the settler-colonial status quo?

An examination of these questions matters because the repeal of section 67 has resulted in a considerable rise in the number of human rights complaints brought by Indigenous Peoples against government – both federal and First Nation. While the volume of complaints expands, the FNCFCS Complaint has captured considerable attention. The Caring Society is significant insofar as it features on-reserve and off-reserve differences; highlights the continued taking of First Nation children in a time when Canadians are waking up to the travesty of the Indian Residential Schools; reveals

\textsuperscript{20} Section 67 of the \textit{CHRA} read:

\begin{quote}
Nothing in this Act affects any provision of the \textit{Indian Act} or any provision made under or pursuant to that Act.
\end{quote}
and challenges the vast socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians; and offers a chance to make a difference.

1.4 A Brief Summary of the Complaint

Section 91(24), Constitution Act, 1867, establishes that Indians and lands reserved for Indians is a federal power while child welfare is a provincial power contained within s.92 (13). Therefore, First Nation children living on-reserves in care are subject to federal jurisdiction, while all other Canadian children in care are subject to the authority of the province within which they live. No two provinces regulate and fund child welfare the same. Canada, meanwhile, opted to adopt its own manual based on provincial funding formulae and has continued to rely on its own same funding formula for decades, as opposed to the provinces who continue to evolve their funding over time. The Caring Society alleges not only is Canada’s funding outdated but also it is below that provided by any province and thus discriminatory as against First Nation children.

Canada’s initial response to the Complaint was to argue that there is no discrimination because there is no comparator group. The Tribunal agreed with Canada and subsequently dismissed the Complaint without a hearing on the merits.21 The decision to dismiss was judicially reviewed.22 The Federal Court’s Justice Mactavish overturned the Tribunal decision, ordered a new hearing and stated a comparator group is unnecessary for the Complaint to be heard on its merits. The Federal Court of Appeal upheld Justice Mactavish’s ruling. In the second hearing, Canada’s position is that funding for First Nation child welfare is simply funding and thus not a “provision of a service.” Therefore, the issues alleged within the Complaint are outside the purview of the Tribunal and in the alternative, the funding regime is not discriminatory in that Canada is not appropriately compared to provincial regimes. Nuances of the parties’ positions are explored further in Chapter 3.

21 Ruling, Shirish P. Chotalia, December 21, 2009, File No. T-1753-08
22 Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 FCA 75

In her decision Justice Mactavish provided considerable guidance to the Tribunal and indeed the parties as to how best to consider the Complaint. Justice Mactavish ruled Canada’s funding of child welfare on reserves combined with its program manual and its own studies offer sufficient evidence to warrant a hearing on the merits. Thus, the Tribunal has the opportunity to determine the Complaint in both findings of fact and law as well as craft remedies that include Indigenous laws in an effort to close the socio-economic gap.

There is a lot riding on the Complaint, which gives rise to both cause for concern and opportunity for reflection on some fundamentals, such as process and decision-making. For example, in Chapter 3 I explore the question: if the Canadian legal system once systematically displaced Indigenous People in favour of the settler population, is the tribunal process – firmly rooted in colonialism – able to truly be fair to Indigenous Peoples? In Chapter 4, I consider that if remedies matter, is it legitimate for the Tribunal to make such decisions based on a set of legal principles derived from a western legal order that is not reflective of Indigenous laws?

---

23 Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2012 FC 445.
24 Federal Court, supra, at note 22.
1.4.1 Choosing Venue

Why not bring a Charter challenge arguing discrimination under section 15 rather than a human rights complaint? Every counsel must choose the venue that offers the best potential outcomes for a client’s matter. There is some resistance among Indigenous Peoples about bringing challenges under the Charter in that outside sections 25 and 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the Charter is not generally reflective of Indigenous legal orders.25 Indeed there are few significant Charter decisions relating to Indigenous Peoples.26 It is possible there was reluctance to bring a Charter challenge for these reasons or possibly – and more likely – because the Tribunal’s enabling statute provides broad powers in relation to remedies.

Moreover a growing number of Indigenous Peoples are joining an international human rights movement27 that finds perhaps purchase because human rights creates a space where colonizing countries, like Canada, might better see itself and reflect on its role in relation to colonization. These arguments suggest that a human rights tribunal may well be a powerful agent of change and a progressive venue in which to pursue that change.

1.5 Methodology

A growing number of scholars are engaged in ongoing conversations related to the current status of the relationship between Canada and Indigenous Peoples;

colonization and racism; human rights and how it may be shaped by neo-liberal policies and decision-making. I considered these issues through examining primary sources in the fields of law and socio-legal studies such as articles, books, monographs as well as government legislation and published reports. Materials produced in the course of the First Nation and Family Caring Society complaint at the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, including the legal submissions of all of the parties, were also reviewed.

Scholarship on systemic remedies is sparser than that on colonialism. For this thesis, I considered the case law and the doctrinally focused work of Professor Kent Roach, Justice Rosalie Abella and other published experts. Scholarship specifically considering systemic remedies and Indigenous Peoples in Canada is virtually non-existent. I draw upon a blend of domestic, international and Indigenous sources, to consider systemic remedies and Indigenous Peoples in Chapter 4.

In an effort to consider how to present my research and more fully reflect the inner workings of my own process, I have also drawn upon Indigenous legal traditions. Professor John Borrows’ work has made room for others like me to follow. For example, in Drawing Out Law, A Spirit’s Guide,28 Borrows calls upon the reader to feel the contents of the book; peer into Anishinabe legal methodology; and examine the meaning of scholarship through both imagery and text sharing the same space. I have not set out to achieve such visual ideas of law within this thesis. I have, however, sought to draw upon my own experience working on a reserve in Ontario for over fourteen years as legal counsel. Also, my ongoing exposure to and comfort with both Anishinabe and Cree laws in action draw me toward moments where I may be able to examine how Indigenous laws may better inform both Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians. I know that the invitation for Indigenous law and Canadian scholarship to share space through stories sometimes creates extraordinary results.

28 J. Borrows, supra, note 5.

Stories are emerging more within scholarship as a means to convey, consider and examine Indigenous legal orders. But this work requires effort. To that end, a challenge for my own work, the reader and hopefully those engaged in human rights is to find ways to make room for Indigenous legal orders. This includes how we relate to stories. For some, it may be an effort to read stories without trying to intellectually master them because mastery of law is the premise of Canadian legal traditions but not necessarily Indigenous legal traditions.

Rather, feel the stories. Be reflective. Consider over time how they may relate to the Western legal traditions, research and scholarship. This is not an insignificant task and caution is in order given that all too often there is a sense of destruction when Canadian law seeks to relate to Indigenous law. Nonetheless, I have elected to include these stories because contemplation and feelings form part of Indigenous legal orders, which are “supposed to be at the heart, they become part of you and you don’t do bad things.” The stories then, remind us to feel law and know inside what is right – whether or not we are prepared to acknowledge those Grandfathers by being honest with others and ourselves.

---

In some ways feeling law – in areas such as human rights, family and criminal law, intellectual property, torts and contracts – is not exclusively the purview of Indigenous legal orders. In relation to human rights, Canada has made considerable strides in educating the population generally. If a state is going to educate its population on human rights, for example, then ways must be found to implement such rights. As Canada is discovering, failure to do might result in a myriad of possible forms of resistance. When people know their rights and believe such rights have been infringed or not implemented there is often public protest, disruption and complaints (both formal and informal). Indigenous Peoples in Canada have both continued to nourish their own legal orders while learning the laws of Canada, including an understanding of and participation in human rights as may be evidenced by the sharp increase in the volume of human rights complaints in Canada brought by Indigenous parties. In this way – and as is examined further in Chapter 3 – the ruling in the Complaint is elevated to precedent setting and important in terms of addressing systemic issues generated by ongoing colonization.

The stories I have included in this thesis are deceptive. Though they may appear simple and perhaps cautionary, embedded within them is law. I have been taught that in the beginning Cree people were given Three Original Laws – the Laws of the People, 35 S. Engle Merry, The Quiet Power of Indicators, Measuring Governance, Corruption and the Rule of Law, (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2015), in which the author considers the various ways a population may protest a state’s failure to provide for human rights, including both peaceful and violent protests.

36 K. Davis, A. Fisher, and S. Engle Merry, Governance by Indicators: Global Power Through Classification and 37 J.Y.Henderson, First Nations Jurisprudence and Aboriginal Rights: Defining the Just Society (Saskatchewan: Native Law Centre, 2006), at 127.
38 The Cree are a nation of Indigenous people generally divided into eight groups and whose traditional territory generally spreads from what is now Quebec, around James Bay, through a northern swath of Ontario across Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Cree and Anishinabe languages, laws and cultures are distinct but in some ways are similar, which as Maria Campbell has explained to me, is because the Cree and Anishinabe once shared a mother.
Laws of the Land and Laws of the Creator.\textsuperscript{39} All of the Laws instruct us on how to be good.\textsuperscript{40} As with many Indigenous cultures, Cree laws are not transmitted on paper and ink but through many means\textsuperscript{41} such as birch bark scrolls, sand drawings, songs, ceremony and storytelling. Storytelling is sometimes diminished in Canadian law as unreliable and foreign, inconsistent with the foundational principles of western legal traditions\textsuperscript{42} such as truth.\textsuperscript{43} But Canadian law is also deeply rooted in stories\textsuperscript{44} and does not have a lock on truth. As set out in this chapter, when it comes to colonization, reflecting on truth can be hard – even ugly – making it all the more important to consider how we come to understand and engage with Indigenous legal orders\textsuperscript{45} and how we might reach toward something intersocietal\textsuperscript{46} starting with the basics: Debwewin.\textsuperscript{47}

In fact, every case in Canadian law is a story dressed up. Courts, tribunals and adjudicators listen to varying versions of the story (argument) and determine how to get to a conclusion by a route meant to be instructive (precedent). The main difference, as I have been taught, is that in Cree culture every person (not just judges) should derive instruction from stories. Stories are a means that are personal and remind us individually how to be good. These lessons come from the cultural power of the stories rather than the institution of the Court.\textsuperscript{48} In this way, stories – whether told in court, before a

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{39} In addition to others, among my Cree teachers who have shared law with me at varying times in my life are Elders Vern Harper, Maria Campbell, Rose Saddleback and Pauline Shirt.
\item \textsuperscript{40} Ibid.
\item \textsuperscript{41} J. Borrows, \textit{supra}, note 5 [Drawing Law].
\item \textsuperscript{43} For more on Anishinabe perspectives on Debwewin (truth) and Canadian law see B. Johnston, “One Generation From Extinction,” \textit{An Anthology of Canadian Native Literature in English}, D.D. Moses and T. Goldie (eds.), (Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1998), 101.
\item \textsuperscript{44} J. Borrows, \textit{Recovering Canada: The Resurgence of Indigenous Law} (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2002).
\item \textsuperscript{45} V. Napoleon and H. Friedland. "Indigenous Legal Traditions: Roots to Renaissance," \textit{The Oxford Handbook of Criminal Law} (2014), chapter 11 at 10. Napoleon and Friedland propose at Table 11.1 parameters by which to engage in Indigenous scholarship with less risk of losing the vitality of the law, such as stories.
\item \textsuperscript{46} Slattery, \textit{supra}, note 19.
\item \textsuperscript{47} Borrows, \textit{supra}, note 42 [Without You].
\item \textsuperscript{48} Harper and Shirt, \textit{supra}, note 39.
\end{itemize}
tribunal, in a circle, or around a fire – are a powerful means to transmit law and the practice of storytelling transcends culture. But there is an ongoing tension between reflection and reality – particularly in relation to the lives of Indigenous Peoples in Canada. You may find tension between the stories, which are meant to be reflective, and the numbers, which are less polite, harsh – even rude – but vividly portray the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians.

In some ways, this thesis is reflective of and takes the reader through a journey of what the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada’s Calls to Action\(^\text{49}\) refers to as “intersocietal cultural competency” in that the stories ask the reader to make room for other approaches to law, obtained not through a linear process, such as taking prerequisite and subject-based courses for a prescribed period of time resulting in the granting of a degree and sitting subsequent competency examinations. In other words, Indigenous laws as presented through stories and western legal scholarship cohabiting in this thesis serves as an example of what it looks like to make room for each other.

Take what is for you. Leave what is not for someone else.

1.6 The (re)Flexibility of Canadian Human Rights

We have a problem. Canada continues to reap the benefits of colonization while Indigenous Peoples continue to carry the burdens.

In essence, colonialism seeks to ensure the original inhabitants of a colony are fundamentally changed through a variety of means, such as physical elimination, cultural extinction or assimilation and thereby typically has an end. This is differentiated from settler colonialism – a subject of growing conversation within scholarship – in which an imperial power sponsors mass immigration and displaces the original inhabitants. The settlers take over the land and create a new governmental authority. All of the settlers are considered racially superior to the original inhabitants. Rather than resources being the focus of commerce – such as fur in Canada’s pre-confederation, early colonization period – land is the primary focus of settler colonialists. Land is required for permanency long after the original purpose of establishing a colony collapses. The systematic dispossession of Indigenous Peoples from land as a means to increase production makes land – and subsequently rights of Indigenous Peoples – central as an 50 Oxford Dictionary, 2014, defines colonialism as “the policy or practice of acquiring full or partial political control over another country, occupying it with settlers, and exploiting it economically.” Further, Ronald J. Horvath’s definition of colonialism in ‘A Definition of Colonialism’, Current Anthropology 13, 1, 1972, pp. 45 – 57 is ‘exogenous domination’ that contains two elements: (1) original displacement; and (2) unequal relations. The ‘colonialism/post-colonialism’ debate is a subject of increasing scholarship. As to whether Canada is “post-colonial”, I leave for another day but rather for the purposes of this thesis suggest that so long as settlers remain in Canada, there is a settler/colonial element we must contend with as a practical reality. For more on “post-colonialism” see: B. Ashcroft, G. Griffiths and H. Tiffin, The Empire Writes Back: Theory and Practice in Post-Colonial Literature, (London: Routledge, 2003); V. Mishra and B. Hodge, “What Is Post(-)colonialism?”, Textual Practice 5, No. 3 (1991), 399-414; B. Moore-Gilbert, G. Stanton, and W. Maley, (eds). Postcolonial Criticism (London: Routledge, 2014); A. Loomba, Colonialism/Postcolonialism. (London: Routledge, 2007).

54 Coulthard, supra, note 11.
“ontological framework for understanding relationships.” Thus, without fundamentally understanding and changing relationships, settler colonialism never ends.

As discussed throughout this thesis – though more particularly in Chapter 2 – colonialism is alive in Canada. Whether settlement is counted in generations or weeks – settler superiority may be assumed over Indigenous Peoples. Until we openly confront this reality and find a reasoned way to reconcile it, closing the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians will remain elusive. In Chapter 2, I explore the way in which the Canadian legal system was created by settler colonialists without the input of Indigenous Peoples and has remained a means by which Canada continues to assert control over all of the lands and resources contributed to confederation by Indigenous Peoples. Thus, the question then rises: is the Canadian legal system flexible, open and independent enough, even in the realm of human rights, to address its colonial past and make room for Indigenous laws? Consider the distance we have to go.

1.7 The Gap: Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians

Numbers matter. They reveal a different kind of story, which may at times feel less reflective but nonetheless, relevant and have become part of the means by which to

---

55 Ibid.
56 A.J. Barker, "The Contemporary Reality of Canadian Imperialism: Settler Colonialism and the Hybrid Colonial State," The American Indian Quarterly 33, No. 3 (2009), 325-351. B. Lawrence and E. Dua, "Decolonizing Antiracism," Social Justice (2005): 120-143 posit that Indigenous People are so marginalised that even antiracist theorists and activists tend to set Indigenous Peoples aside when challenging racism in Canada. In this way, it is argued that the realm of antiracism participates in the continued colonization of Indigenous Peoples.
convey the existence of serious problems, such as the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians. It is important to consider the source of numbers and both why and how certain things are measured and reported. The majority of numbers included here are produced by the Canadian government, whom as we shall see have sought numbers to either use against Indigenous Peoples, or ignore Indigenous Peoples entirely. Put plainly, numbers illustrate that Indigenous Peoples are “at the back of the line of every line you do not want to be at the back of and at the front of every line you do not want to be at the front of and usually by a multifold of five.” The most comprehensive numbers illuminate the fact that the socio-economic gap between Canadians and Indigenous People is widening. The numbers set out here are meant to both provide a common understanding of this aspect of the relationship between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians relationships and to promote critical dialogue.

Approximately four percent of Canada’s population is Aboriginal, which translates into just over 1.1 million people. The Indigenous population is growing at a rate almost six times faster than the general population and “is much younger than the non-Aboriginal population.” There are now slightly more Indigenous Peoples living in

---

60 Ibid.
61 Caring Society Complaint: Testimony of Dr. John Milloy, Transcript Vol. 33 at pp. 129-135.
63 Statistics Canada. 2006 Census: Aboriginal Peoples in Canada in 2006: Inuit, Metis and First Nations, 2006 Census: Findings (January 2008) (Ottawa: Statistics Canada, 2007). There has been both a 2010 update and 2012 update, which are not as comprehensive as the 2006 census report. Where possible, the updated numbers of 2010 and 2012 are specifically noted.
urban areas than on reserves.67 Indigenous Peoples living in western provinces are “four to eleven times more likely to live in crowded conditions than their non-Aboriginal counterparts,”68 while the urban Indigenous population living in major Canadian cities are “two to three times more likely than the non-Aboriginal population to live in dwellings needing major repairs.”69 With respect to employment and incomes, Indigenous Peoples have lower employment rates and higher unemployment rates than their non-Aboriginal counterparts70 with the same levels of education while “on-reserve incomes are the lowest of all at 49 percent of total [national average] income.”71 Indigenous Peoples are also at the front of the line when it comes to living each day homeless.72

The “back of the line” numbers show us Indigenous Peoples are the typically the last to have access to safe drinking water;73 an afterthought when it comes to indoor plumbing;74 limited access to safe housing;75 participation in the economy;76 preservation

68 Statistics Canada, supra, note 63 [2006 Census].
69 Ibid.
70 Statistics Canada, supra, note 63 [Zeitsma Report]
71 M. Mendelson, Aboriginal Peoples and Postsecondary Education in Canada, Caledon Institute of Social Policy, (July 2006).
73 For a discussion on the impacts of unsafe drinking water and Canada’s lack of consideration for clean drinking water supply of First Nation communities based on smaller economies of scale (as is typical of many First Nation populations), see J-M. Davies and A. Mazumder, “Health and Environmental Policy Issues in Canada: the Role of Watershed Management in Sustaining Clean Drinking Water Quality at Surface Sources,” Journal of Environmental Management (68) 2003, 273-286.
75 Homelessness Report, supra, note 72.
of their cultures;\textsuperscript{77} to live the life they choose versus one imposed by statute;\textsuperscript{78} and access to health care\textsuperscript{79} except if they are imprisoned wherein all of these elements (including a job), are more accessible.

The “front of the line numbers” exposes the way Indigenous Peoples are among the first Canada’s justice system is prepared to send to prison, so much so that the number of Indigenous and visible minority inmates has increased in the past decade by seventy-five percent.\textsuperscript{80} Rather than examine the potential systemic issues giving rise to the numbers, Canada’s response has been to build more prison cells to house them all.\textsuperscript{81}

\subsection*{1.8 Indigenous Women & Children}

The sheer numbers of Indigenous women in Canada’s penitentiaries is staggering with a 97\% increase since 2002.\textsuperscript{82} Indigenous girls and women are out in front for experiencing abuse with rates three to five times higher than their non-Indigenous Canadian counterparts.\textsuperscript{83} Unsurprisingly, Indigenous girls and women are also at the front

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{78} M.E. Turpel, "Patriarchy and Paternalism: The Legacy of the Canadian State for First Nations Women," \textit{Can. J. Women & L.} 6 (1993): 174. It is concerning that this article was written over a decade ago and remains substantively relevant as a demonstration of how little has advanced in the Canadian legal system in relation to Aboriginal women.
\item \textsuperscript{79} S.Y. Tang and A.J. Browne, "‘Race Matters: Racialization and Egalitarian Discourses Involving Aboriginal People in the Canadian Health Care Context." \textit{Ethnicity and Health} 13.2 (2008), 109-127; S.W. Hwang, "Homelessness and Health," \textit{Canadian Medical Association Journal} 164.2 (2001), 229-233. Also, though \textit{Chaoulli v Quebec (AG) 1 S.C.R. 791, 2005 SCC 35}, opened up the possibility of private health care for Canadians in Quebec, Aboriginal people – particularly status Indians – remain more limited than their Canadian counterparts when it comes to access to health care.
\item \textsuperscript{80} \textit{Ibid.}
of the line for victims of homicide in comparison to Canada’s general population.\textsuperscript{84} More often than not the counter-narrative goes that the numbers of murdered and missing Indigenous women is their own fault for having the audacity of being born Aboriginal\textsuperscript{85} and because they live a disproportionately high-risk lifestyle.\textsuperscript{86} Though the claim of high-risk lifestyles is not true and such levels of going violence against Indigenous women ought to constitute national outrage.\textsuperscript{87}

When it comes to violence against Indigenous women in Canada the justice system’s response has long been and continues to be troubling.\textsuperscript{88} Consider that in his 2007 murder trial, it was revealed Robert Picton had been hunting, torturing and killing Indigenous women for years without coming to the attention of the police and still has yet to be tried for all of his other Indigenous victims.\textsuperscript{89} In 1971, Helen Betty Osborne was preparing to become a teacher, was abducted by four white men, sexually assaulted and beaten to death so violently that it took weeks for the coroner to identify her remains and over fifteen years for the men responsible to be charged.\textsuperscript{90} No matter Osborne’s education, when the trial into her murder began, locals of The Pas, Winnipeg stated Osborne “had been given fair warning that she should consent to having sex with the four

\begin{thebibliography}{99}
\bibitem{84} O’Donnell and Wallace, \textit{supra} at note 66, at 43 that states Aboriginal women were victims of homicide at a rate of “5.4 per 1000 population, compared to 0.8 per 100,000 for non-Aboriginal victims (almost seven times higher).”
\bibitem{88} N. Pietsch, ""I’m Not That Kind of Girl": White Femininity, the Other, and the Legal/Social Sanctioning of Sexual Violence Against Racialized Women," \textit{Canadian Woman Studies} 28.1 (2009), 136.
\end{thebibliography}
[white men] or die.” As set out at trial, ‘fair warning’ were the sexually charged, racial slurs and demands of her attackers, standing as testament to our collective consciousness that sees Indigenous women as spoils of colonization. What about Felicia Solomon? A cousin of Helen Betty Osborne’s from the same First Nation and also forced to leave her home on-reserve to be educated in Winnipeg. She was murdered after school in 2003. Helen Betty Osborne was nineteen years old. Felicia Solomon was sixteen. The list is painfully long and growing, as the situation for Indigenous women continues to be dire. The children of Indigenous women live similarly precarious lives.

Approximately 150,000 Indigenous children attended residential schools between 1870’s to the mid 1990’s. Though the then Prime Minister of Canada apologized to First Nations people for the residential school legacy and promised it would never happen again, Indigenous children today remain more than eight times more likely than their counterparts to be placed in care. The result is children continue to be taken and there are more First Nation children in care now than were ever in residential schools. Overall, children in foster care are more likely to suffer serious mental health problems and serious physical harm and are 4.5 times more likely to die preventable deaths than

93 Ibid.
94 Ibid.
95 Ibid.
96 For more details on the names, ages and numbers of murdered and missing Aboriginal women and a ground-breaking database developed by M.A. Peirce, supra, note 87.
100 N. Trocmé, supra, note 98.
children in the general population. These numbers lead to an adult Indigenous population – particularly women – who are more likely to have suffered physical harm as a child and more likely to suffer from mental health issues from being taken and placed in foster care. This early damage compromises the ability of people to create healthy families and passes the cycle of harm on to yet another generation.

Indigenous babies are among most likely to die young, with infant mortality rates considerably higher than the Canadian population. Nationally, the infant mortality rate – regarded as a comprehensive indicator of a given society’s level of health that measures the well-being of infants, children and their families – is higher among First Nation children born whether on-reserve or off-reserve as well as Inuit and Metis children than their Canadian counterparts.

1.9 On-Reserves & Housing

The average unemployment rate on reserves in Canada typically tracks three times higher than Canada’s unemployment rate. One in four First Nation children on-reserves lives in poverty, which is almost double the national average. The average household income for First Nations living on reserve is just under $16,000.00 - almost 104 J. Smylie, D. Fell and Arne Ohlsson, “A Review of Aboriginal Infant Mortality Rates in Canada: Striking and Rersistent Aboriginal/non-Aboriginal Inequities,” Canadian Journal of Public Health/Revue Canadienne de Sante’e Publique (2010), 143-148. The review found that whether Aboriginal children were born on-reserve or off-reserve (i.e. in cities and towns), the infant mortality rate remained higher than in the mainstream Canadian population. This is another indicator that socio-economic disparities are not resolved with the over-simplistic proposal to simply migrate all Aboriginal people into cities and thereby close the gap.

---

105 Ibid.
107 Ibid.
half of the average Canadian household. First Nations continue to experience an on-reserve housing crisis with an estimated shortfall of 85,000 housing units and in many situations single-family homes have multiple families living in one and two bedroom units. Almost half of the current on-reserve housing stock is in need of major repairs and another fifteen percent require complete replacement. Similarly, at least half of First Nation houses are contaminated with mold and over five thousand houses do not have adequate sewage and indoor plumbing. Moreover, First Nation people living on-reserve with regular employment are unable to secure a mortgage for their housing needs and repairs because Canada has statutorily barred them from doing so in the Indian Act, which was a “monolithically injurious piece of legislation” passed to both “control and centralize all aspects of Indian life from identity and governance, to land and subsistence.” Both the law and government spending – or lack thereof – on accessible and safe housing combine to oppress Indigenous Peoples living on-reserves.

How is it that we continue to be unconcerned with the high death rate among Indigenous infants yet if they survive we steal them away? Why are we not addressing the housing crisis on-reserves for the benefit of First Nation children versus taking them away and placing them in foster care in unprecedented numbers? The breadth of the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians is breath-taking.

---

108 Ibid.
110 Ibid.
111 Ibid.
112 Section 87, Indian Act works to prohibit security for property located on reserve, which means that if an Aboriginal person living on reserve defaulted on their mortgage the lender would not be able to seize the property on-reserve. In addition, only Indians within the meaning of the Act are able to own property on-reserve so even if the lender could seize the house the market is severely limited to the number of buyers who are also Indians on the same reserve are the only people legally able to purchase the house.
These numbers matter for the Tribunal as context when crafting remedies. The Caring Society Complaint offers a dual narrative of both narrow and broad insofar as creating opportunity to address proper funding for First Nation child welfare and the underlying issues of colonization. Remedies in the Complaint should be crafted to address both the equality of funding as well as more broadly the systemic and ongoing harm of colonization that has greatly contributed to the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians.

If we care to meaningfully address the socio-economic gap, we must do so by facing the Grandfather of Debwewin.

1.10 Some Conclusions

The numbers reveal a fire that is raging through the forest, burning the prospects of First Nations children for healthy, successful futures.

There is an increasing engagement of Indigenous Peoples in the global human rights movement,115 which in part is reflected in the multi-fold increase in the number of complaints making their way through the Canadian human rights system. This rise in complaints presents opportunity to be reflective on the relationship between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians. This also presents opportunity to draw not only on making room for Indigenous laws and strengthening Canada’s history of legal pluralism but also to draw in the best of international perspectives.

---

There is no legal impediment preventing the Tribunal from drawing in the elements of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples\textsuperscript{116} (UNDRIP) that speak to self-determination, self-government, a right to culture, a right to be free. Ordering First Nation culturally relevant child welfare services is within the Tribunal’s reach. To that end, there is a moral, political and legal urgency to closing the divide. From the Royal Commission on Indigenous Peoples to the Report of the Truth and Reconciliation to the growing number of rights cases being decided favourably by the Supreme Court of Canada.\textsuperscript{117} The time is ripe for the Tribunal to be brave and address the ugliness of ongoing colonialism.

As we shall see in the Caring Society complaint, the Tribunal has an opportunity to achieve substantive equality through narrowing the gap by harnessing a tremendous remedial potential and finding a conciliatory way forward for First Nations children and families. Upon a finding of discrimination against First Nation children, there is nothing preventing the Tribunal from ordering a Kelowna Accord, roundtable style design and implementation of new, culturally relevant child and family services for Indigenous People. In such a process, Indigenous Peoples must be relied upon as partners and the keepers of solutions, not considered as part of the problem. Indeed, there is much that would support such a remedial order, starting with addressing the high number of First Nation children in care, which currently surpasses the number of students in Indian Residential Schools.\textsuperscript{118}

\begin{footnotes}
\end{footnotes}
The engagement of Indigenous Peoples with human rights mechanisms is exciting and intriguing because of the way it opens up possibilities for carefully constructed and wide-ranging remedies. Such remedies would aim at the empirical fact of inequality between Indigenous and non Indigenous Canadians. Confronting these numbers may reveal important truths and suggest innovative and far-reaching remedial possibilities. Do the numbers serve only to demonstrate a seemingly insurmountable, unsolvable gap or do they also assist us toward solutions? What about the continued increase in the number of First Nation children in care? Are they not entitled to the same access to services as all other Canadian children? Numbers not only reveal the ongoing effects of colonialism but also may help us consider remedies, which are discussed further in Chapter 4. The burning fire of colonialism continues to ravage First Nations children, families and communities. What are we prepared to do about it?
CHAPTER 2 – MINAADENDAMOWIN (RESPECT): (re)STRUCTURING COLONIALISM

How Birch Got Its Marks

Long ago, in a great valley not far from here there was a village of plenty. Indeed, the people of the valley had so much for so long they forgot how to share. The people took everything they had for granted as their right for simply being the people of the valley. They cast aside the ways of their ancestors. They stopped giving thanks. They forgot that although they needed the water, plants and animals to live the water, plants and animals did not need the people. The people of the valley lost respect for anything but themselves.

One spring, when Animikii (thunderbird) returned and began to build his nest, he saw how arrogant the people had become and set out to teach them a lesson. As the days passed the people had trouble lighting a fire. They could not cook or find warmth on cold nights. As the days turned into weeks the old people shivered and the children went hungry. Finally, one of the boys had enough and told the village of his plan to get fire. All agreed.

The boy turned himself into a rabbit and bounded out of the valley to the top of the highest mountain where he asked Animikii if he could come into the great bird’s nest. Animikii agreed explaining to the rabbit how he withheld fire from the people of the valley for their contempt. As soon as Animikii looked away while pruning his feathers, the rabbit jumped into the fire that warmed Animikii’s nest until his fur was alight. He 119 There are many stories about the birch. This one was shared with me by John Snake, Rama First Nation. While it was told to me by John Snake better than I relay it here, if you have heard it told differently, I ask that you make it right in your own mind and accept the spirit with which I restate it here.

---

hopped out of nest and returned to the valley where – before turning back into a boy – he rolled in the grasses so the people could come and retake fire.

Realizing he had been tricked, Animikii lifted off with his great wings and chased the boy who was frightened of the powerful bird and ran appealing for help. None was offered until finally the boy heard a voice offering shelter. It was the birch – known both for its beautiful white bark and celebrated skills as a healer.

Shaking the boy stood close to the tree and wrapped his arms around the smooth white bark. Animikii was furious at being deceived and from his great red eyes, lashed the birch with strikes of lightning over and over again. Each bolt scorched the birch’s bark but the gentle tree held steady. Animikii grew tired and flew back to his nest leaving the boy to confess his deeds. In turn for his deception, the birch told the boy that it would not heal itself but instead keep the marks on its bark as a reminder of this time.

2.1 A Roadmap

In this Chapter I examine Canada’s master narrative, which allows Canada to continue to draw power from a colonialist root and view Indigenous Peoples through a lens of white supremacy. Does this master narrative permit the Crown to continue see Indigenous Peoples as a problem with respect to child welfare versus part of the solution? What are some of the ways in which colonialism is entangled in the Complaint? By way of response, I briefly set out the historical relationship between Indigenous Peoples and Canada. In the section “Not Talking About Settler Colonialism” I turn to other branches of Canada’s legal apparatus that might find more room for engaging in Indigenous laws and acknowledge colonial authority. I look to inquiries, such as the Stonechild Inquiry that substantively makes recommendations that fail to address colonialism and racism while at the same time it is announced by the then Justice Minister as addressing racism. Stonechild offers lessons as a cautionary tale for the Tribunal when considering meaningful, systemic remedies regarding the Complaint insofar as there must be acknowledgment of systemic issues for there to be effective systemic remedies. Stonechild also illustrates how we might substantively do one thing while announce another. But all inquiries are not the same. I also examine the Manitoba Justice Inquiry (MJI) as a more affirming use of inquiries even if the recommendations – however well structured – are ultimately not implemented. I propose hope may remain for an effective implementation of the Calls for Action from the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada, in spite of Canada’s less than perfect record of using the inquiry process and subsequent recommendations to narrow the socio-economic gap.

I then turn to the international human rights and consider the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP) as well as how international agreements have been used in Canada’s courts. This too may offer the Tribunal opportunity to draw upon the principles set out in UNDRIP when crafting systemic remedies because Canada’s courts have a history of considering international agreements.

In this Chapter I also discuss some of the Indigenous responses to the 2008 amendment of the CRHA – in particular the debate between collective versus individual rights. As well I look at the relationship between the CHRA amendments and the Indian Act. Finally, I investigate Canada’s appointment process to the Tribunal and inquire why does not require commissioners in the human rights system to report directly to all of Parliament versus the Executive. The appointments process matters because it is the commissioners of the Tribunal who are charged with deciding the Complaint. It should be asked what might qualify them to draw upon Indigenous laws and whether they are able to acknowledge colonialism as they craft systemic remedies. In the end, I conclude that there are some spots of hope but if the Tribunal is going to get the systemic remedies right, they will have to perform a lot of heavy lifting and unlike Stonechild, resist finding discrimination in the Complaint amounts to little more than administration in nature. I propose respect for Indigenous laws on the part of the Tribunal to acknowledge the white supremacist assumptions in Canadian law. I also conclude that in order for a finding of discrimination with respect to the Complaint to be effective at narrowing the socio-economic gap the Tribunal should meaningfully draw upon and respect the principles of UNDRIP and Indigenous laws.

2.2 The Master Narrative

“Canada has no history of colonialism.”

– Former Prime Minister Harper, 2009, G20 in Pittsburgh

Like numbers, law matters. Also like numbers, law matters so much that a discourse on the rule of law is found not only in the realm of academia but is folded into popular literature, everyday discussions, at dining room tables and across media. The 120 This quote arises from a press conference at the close of the G20 summit in Pittsburgh in 2009. Specifically, former Prime Minister Harper stated:

---

[we] also has no history of colonialism. So we have all the things that many people admire about the great powers but none of the things that threaten or bother them.

premise that law matters upholds “notions of constitutionalism, of human rights, and of stable democratic government, to be contrasted with dictatorial and oppressive forms.”123 Words and principles of law like ‘human rights’, ‘fairness’, ‘transparency’ and ‘freedom’ are often tossed about as laudable ideals of a democratic society. But what happens to the legal discourse founded on such principles when viewed through a colonialist lens?

Human rights matter enough to Canada that international principles of human rights have been woven into the Charter.124 Canada is also a signatory to various international declarations on human and Indigenous rights such as the Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration of the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, which reflect the principles of equality, that Canada’s human rights framework is based upon.125 Yet, Canada’s pledges on the international stage diverge considerably from its domestic practices when it comes to Indigenous Peoples. This duplicity has been characterized as myth building through a self-reinforced master narrative126 – ‘master narrative’ in this instance meaning the overarching story that Canada retells in many forums that Indigenous Peoples do have not laws and were conquered, surrendering all of the lands and resources now claimed by Canada. This master story is aided by a legal system that

123 Ibid.
124 S. Day, L. Larmarche and K. Norman, 14 Arguments in Favour of Human Rights Institutions, (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2014).
125 Ibid.
126 S. Thobani, Exalted Subjects: Studies in the Making of Race and Nation in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2007), at 4. Moreover, at 12 Thobani notes:
In the case of Canada, the marking of Native peoples as ‘doomed to extinction’ is an example of the necropolitics indispensable to the incipient sovereignty. The creation of reserves and, subsequently, the residential school system as the sites for the physical and cultural extinction of these peoples points to a long history of the deployment of necropower in the services of the colonial order and (re) production of the national subject.
In short, Canada’s building of a master narrative supports the taking of lands and resources held by Aboriginal Peoples, who are either extinct or it is simply a question of timing before Aboriginal Peoples, their laws, languages, cultures, customs, practices and traditions have vanished.
chronicles colonization through process, rulings of courts, decisions of tribunals and findings of inquiry and a universal human rights system built upon a colonialist regime that entangles Indigenous Peoples within it. This veneer of inclusivity, layered over colonialism, generates a glossy, positive reflection for Canada while ignoring the colonialist rot underneath.

In essence, here is how Canada’s master narrative impacts Indigenous Peoples. The soft-underbelly of Canada’s story marks Indigenous Peoples as more likely to commit crimes; eternal outsiders of civilized society; deviant. These ideas explain the historical legacies that predispose Indigenous Peoples toward troublesome conduct and their failure to uplift themselves, justifying more stringent treatment. In other words, in both subtle and not so subtle ways, Indigenous Peoples are viewed as “deviant by choice and fundamentally different from the rest of “normal white society”.

In these ways, among others, colonialism leads to racism that is at once overt and covert. Moreover, the “ultimate expression of sovereignty resides, to a large degree, in the power and the capacity to dictate who may live and who must die.” As set out in this Chapter, the two faces of Canada’s human rights record domestically and its commitments internationally grate against each other, sometimes so violently that Indigenous Peoples are either silenced, left for dead or both. How did it start to go wrong?

2.3 What Lurks Beneath: Building the Relationship & Settling Canada

It has been argued that the master narrative of the relationship between Indigenous Peoples and the Crown was initially formed by the Royal Proclamation, 1763. Though a long and complicated story, one of the key moments in Canada’s colonial legacy was the issuance of the Royal Proclamation, 1763 – a document providing for English control over the lands included as a part of Canada. Indigenous Peoples were not involved in the drafting of the Proclamation. Nonetheless, the Proclamation acknowledges but does not fully consider the pre-existing relationship of Indigenous Peoples with the settlers regarding sharing of resources while respecting the others sovereignty and legal orders. Moreover, without a war against Indigenous Peoples or surrender the Royal Proclamation is a statement of relationship, not a deed to the lands and resources of Canada, which were already in the possession of Indigenous Peoples.

Scholars have argued Canada’s legal system is complicit in continuously breaching human rights when it comes to Indigenous Peoples in order to protect the dubious

---

137 Ibid, the Royal Proclamation, 1763 was the precursor to the Treaty of Niagara, 1764 between the English Crown and Aboriginal Peoples represented at Niagara in 1764.
139 Borrows, supra, note 136.
140 Ibid.
foundation of Crown sovereignty, upon which legal actors source their legitimacy.\textsuperscript{141} Coulthard further posits an “unprecedented degree of protection for certain ‘cultural’ practices within the state, it [the court] has nonetheless repeatedly and steadfastly refused to challenge the racist origin of Canada’s assumed sovereign authority over Indigenous peoples and their territories.”\textsuperscript{142} In sum, the settling of Canada through the assertion of Crown sovereignty is myth building of tremendous proportions\textsuperscript{143} and all branches of the legal system – courts, tribunals, inquiries and police – legitimize this power. In other words, the law has a role to play in allowing politicians to proclaim, that there is no history of colonialism.\textsuperscript{144} Yet the suppression of Indigenous Peoples under the guise of western moral superiority\textsuperscript{145} over the “savages”\textsuperscript{146} continues. Can the Tribunal see the master narrative at work in the Complaint and craft the systemic remedies necessary for

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item Coulthard, \textit{supra}, note 11.
\item J. M. Blaut, \textit{Colonizer's Model of the World Geographical Diffusionism and Eurocentric History}, (New York: Guilford Press 1992), at 1, writes:
\begin{quote}
The Purpose of this book is to undermine one of the most powerful beliefs of our time concerning world history and world geography. This belief is the notion that European civilization - 'The West' - has had some unique historical advantage, some special quality of race or culture or environment or mind or spirit, which gives the human community a permanent superiority over all other communities, at all times in history and down to the present...Europe eternally advances, progresses, modernizes. The rest of the world advances more sluggishly, or stagnates, it is 'traditional society.'
\end{quote}
\item Harper, \textit{supra}, note 120.
\item R. Harding, examines the evolving media representation of Indigenous Peoples as ‘savage’ in "Historical Representations of Aboriginal Peoples in the Canadian News Media." \textit{Discourse & Society} 17, No. 2 (2006), 205-235 and concludes that although some of the words such as ‘savage’ may have fallen out of favour in the media the representation of Indigenous Peoples in Canadian news has remained consistent from the late 19\textsuperscript{th} century. Similarly, until the Courts wholly reject the legitimacy of Crown sovereignty over Indigenous Peoples, the law of Canada is – like the Canadian press – arguably more polite toward Indigenous peoples but remains paternalistic.
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
change? Colonization is a well-travelled road. Using remedies to construct a new road, one that can narrow the socio-economic gap will be difficult.

2.4 Not Talking About Settler Colonialism

2.4.1 The Indian Act: An Instrument of Assimilation & Destruction

The Indian Act, introduced in 1876\textsuperscript{147}, is fraught with problems and prejudice, which remain today. If there was ever any doubt as to the Indian Act’s purpose, Duncan Campbell Scott, Deputy Superintendent of the Department of Indian Affairs from 1913 to 1932, infamously stated, “I want to get rid of the Indian problem. I do not think as a matter of fact, that the country ought to continuously protect a class of people who are able to stand alone…Our objective is to continue until there is not a single Indian in Canada that has not been absorbed into the body politic and there is no Indian question, and no Indian Department, that is the whole object of this Bill.”\textsuperscript{148}

The Act was intended first to ‘Indianize’ Indigenous Peoples\textsuperscript{149} by legislatively defining the group and then eliminating them. First the Act homogenized all Indigenous Peoples with distinct cultures, languages, laws, practices and traditions into a singular “Indian” category. Then – up until 1985\textsuperscript{150} – the Act worked to deny the ‘Indian’ identity

\textsuperscript{147} The Indian Act, 1876 was a consolidation of laws that were previously enacted pre-confederation and was passed under section 19(24), Constitution Act, 1867. The Act replaced Upper Canada’s Gradual Civilization Act, 1857 and the Gradual Enfranchisement Act, 1869. The Act creates reserve lands and its initial purpose was to administer Indians in a manner that forces Indians to renounce their status under the Act and become members of Canada’s civilized society – also known as enfranchisement. The Act has gone through numerous amendments over the years from 1877 up to and including 2013.

\textsuperscript{148} J. Leslie, The Historical Development of the Indian Act, 2 ed. (Ottawa: Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Treaties and Historical Research Branch, 1978), at 114. The Bill referred to in the quote was a Bill to amend the Indian Act in even more restrictive measures, including enfranchisement.

\textsuperscript{150} Bill C-31 was introduced to change the definitions within the Indian Act that determine who is entitled to status under the Act and who is not. Ultimately, the Bill was passed and the Act amended. Sharon McIvor brought litigation against Canada for the Bill citing it limitations of which Aboriginal women were entitled to regain their Indian status prior to 1985 and which women were not. The time period for entitlement matters because if a woman who lost status was able to regain it – even after her death – then so too was there potential for her descendants to regain Indian status. The provisions of Bill C-35 merely displaced the discrimination based on gender down to another generation whose of every Indian woman who married a non-Indian man. Simultaneously, the Act eliminated Indians through enfranchisement upon high school graduations, and required, often by force, Indian children to attend residential schools, which not only beat the culture and language out of them but also would eliminate status upon graduation. The Act has had devastating consequences for the number of people identified by Canada as Indians.

Though some women and their children have regained status, the courts placed limitations on the retroactivity of Indian status with the effect of merely displacing enfranchisement by another generation. Moreover, though given opportunity to do so, as we have seen with inquiry after inquiry – examples of which are examined in this thesis – Canada has opted to avoid unraveling the colonialist underpinnings found in the language of the Act. Instead the Act allows for the continued attacks against Indigenous Peoples through legislation. Moreover, the critical position of First Nations children, a position the Complaint attempts to partly remedy, informs the larger question of First Nations rights because if children are not raised in their culture, then the master narrative is reinforced insofar as Indigenous Peoples were a ‘problem’ that was solved by removing children and prohibiting them from keeping Indigenous cultures, laws, languages and ceremonies. But support for the master narratives is not only found in the Indian Act. Attempts at ‘civilization’ and the elimination of the ‘Indian problem’ come in many forms that are assimilative and violent.

2.4.2 Neil Stonechild

In 1990, on a November night when temperatures plunged to twenty-eight degrees below zero Celsius, Saskatoon police drove Neil Stonechild – a member of the Salteaux Nation – to the outskirts of the city and left him in a field to find his way home. The practice of driving Indigenous Peoples outside the city and forcing them to hand over their coat or shoes was so common it had a name: a starlight tour. Stonechild’s last words from the back of a police cruiser to a friend ultimately proved prescient, “Help me. They’re going to kill me.” Stonechild died that night of hypothermia and was found five-days later with marks on his wrist, abrasions on his face and missing one of his shoes. An inquiry was called that offers us lessons with respect to constructing remedies in the Complaint relating to First Nation children in foster care.

In the aftermath of an inquiry into Stonechild’s death no charges were laid in spite of testimony of police involvement; the finding of poor police investigation practices; the destruction or loss of police evidence related to Stonechild’s death; and the police practice of taking only Indigenous Peoples on starlight tours – a glaring example of overt racism. Perhaps more tellingly, no recommendations from the Inquiry specifically addressed the colonialist assumptions of superiority and racism thriving in the bowels of Saskatoon’s police department.

---

155 Stonechild Inquiry, supra, note 152.
156 There are, of course, other inquiries relating to the state and Aboriginal people (too many). I draw upon the Stonechild Inquiry as it most starkly addresses the distance of the gap – from the death of Neil Stonechild to a subsequent inquiry process and its conclusions to finally the Minister of Justice’s address to law graduates, in which he states Stonechild’s death motivated by racism and the importance of the justice system to uphold the values of human rights.
157 Stonechild Inquiry, supra, note 152.
Conversely, shortly after the Inquiry’s Report was released the Minister of Justice stated:

We cannot accept a society in which the most vulnerable people in our community are not able to turn for help to those entrusted with protecting them... Embedded in s. 15 [of the Charter], is the same principle that animated the United Nations’ Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which was adopted by the UN General Assembly in 1948. That principle is that everyone is free and equal in dignity and rights and entitled to equal respect and consideration regardless of the group to which he or she belongs. One of the targets of s.15 and human rights legislation generally has been racism—the notion that a person's race is a significant factor in determining his or her worth as a human being. Racism is the notion that your race, your difference from me, makes you inferior to me.\(^{158}\)

In other words, the then Minister boldly asserts racism is an offence to human rights and not tolerated in Saskatchewan while the racist practices of the police were reduced in importance by the Inquiry to that of poor administration. The findings and recommendations of the report were presented as a common sense response to a terrible situation.

The remarkable difference between the actual substance of the Inquiry and the outward presentation of it as anti-racist is troublesome and serves as evidence of a white-knuckled grip on a master narrative, which ensures status quo in the larger socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians wherein Indigenous Peoples have very limited currency to effect fundamental change. Further, there was no mention in the Inquiry’s recommendations that the Indian Act is racist law\(^{159}\) that fosters the kind of second-class treatment Indigenous Peoples experience with the legal system.

\(^{158}\) Hon. F. Quennell, Q.C. Stonechild, the Aboriginal Community, Equality and Justice: A Message from the Justice Minister, 68 Sask. L. Rev., at 113.

Both the Indian Act and ignoring underlying, deeply problematic ideas of who is Indigenous,\(^{160}\) allows colonialism to be reproduced and appear as racism. Neil Stonechild was just seventeen years old at the time of his death.\(^{161}\) He was a First Nation child and though the focus of the inquiry into his death was weighted toward the police, it is important to not overlook how vulnerable First Nation children are – particularly within the legal system that fails them repetitively. Moreover, that a legal process, such a an inquiry, could examine Stonechild’s death and fail to make recommendations that challenge the legal system’s role and its colonialist underpinnings elevates the level of caution in relation to the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal. Beyond finding for funding equality of First Nation children in care with all other Canadian children, can the legal system really see itself and its role in oppressing Indigenous Peoples and then go further to create remedies that address such profound systemic damage?

The then Saskatchewan Minister of Justice speaks of the hierarchical organizing of humans but fails to acknowledge, even tacitly, that settler colonialism is the name of the burr that rubs the relationship raw. While racism may also be at issue, ignoring the ongoing benefits derived by the settler population through colonialism is a more insidious and destructive force because everyone benefits – except for Indigenous Peoples – meaning everyone owns a piece of the mess too.

The final report of the inquiry into Stonechild’s death is not focused on rooting out settler colonialism or addressing racism as the Minister cast it. In this way, contrary to the Minister’s statement, Stonechild serves as an example of a failure to uphold the principles of s.15 and human rights legislation because the structure of inquiry itself is symptomatic of a larger paradigm: the subversion of Indigenous cultures, laws, people and lives in favour of the settler population.\textsuperscript{162} Canada’s relationship with Indigenous Peoples is built upon a myth that the Crown is sovereign over Indigenous Peoples.\textsuperscript{163} To perpetuate this myth, Indigenous Peoples are asked to play a role that requires their subjugation to colonialism and recasts any problems with the state as administrative in nature. Clashes come when Indigenous Peoples, who have not been conquered,\textsuperscript{164} refuse to play. As the Stonechild Inquiry demonstrates, it is possible for investigations to produce volumes of documentation about the violence visited upon Indigenous Peoples without acknowledging colonialism, systemic racism, and the fact that the maltreatment of Indigenous Peoples is a founding principle of this country.

---

\(^{160}\) Ibid [Lawrence].

\(^{161}\) Ibid.

2.4.3 \textit{Blind Inquiry}

The Stonechild Inquiry is a cautionary tale of how the Canadian legal system fails to see its own role in ongoing colonial violence and thereby does not offer recommendations or remedies aimed at addressing systemic issues. Though condemning the police’s misconduct in relation to the death of Neil Stonechild, in keeping with Canada’s myth that Indigenous Peoples are “doomed to extinction,”\textsuperscript{165} the final report of the Inquiry sidesteps the issue and is entirely devoid of mention of colonialism. Rather the Report favours a casting of the affair as police misconduct.\textsuperscript{166} Skating over considerable evidence that colonialism and racism was a central factor leading to

\begin{flushleft}

\textsuperscript{165} Thobani, supra, note 159.

\end{flushleft}
Stonechild’s death is, in some ways, not surprising and reinforces the premise that the “ideology of racelessness, a hallmark of the Canadian historical tradition, is very much in keeping with our national mythology that Canada is not a racist country.”

Ironically, from Duncan Campbell Scott’s wish to eliminate the “Indian problem;” the enfranchisement of Indigenous Peoples under the Indian Act; creating Indian Residential Schools; the failure of then Prime Minister Harper to even acknowledge a history of colonialism – to list a few moments - Canada has all the while been reinforcing white racial superiority.

The Inquiry was offered a wide mandate and presented considerable opportunity to confront the broader elements that allowed settler-colonialism to thrive, and resulted in starlight tours in the first instance. Indeed the Inquiry confirmed the existence of such a brutal police practice that targeted only Indigenous Peoples. There was opportunity to ferret out the roots of the starlight tour practice by the police, which was fed by colonialism, and examine how such notions about Indigenous Peoples have spread into police assumptions and practices; and how the resulting racism was seemingly openly accepted as part of the relationship between Indigenous Peoples in Saskatoon and the city’s police department. In the end, the Inquiry had eight recommendations. None

---

167 M. Bevir and R.A.W. Rhodes “Interpretive Theory.” In Theory and Methods in Political Science, ed. D. Marsh and G. Stoker (New York: St. Martin’s Press) (1995) at 138, argues that circular reasoning is embedded within the master narrative that upholds how things are preferred to be understood and thereby viewed through a particular lens versus the way things really are. In this way, the Inquiry Commissioner was able to view police conduct as a few troublesome elements within a greater police authority meant to serve and protect rather than asking whom the police serve and protect and why Neil Stonechild was seemingly undeserving of protection?

168 C. Backhouse, Colour-Coded: A Legal History of Racism in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1999), at 14.

169 Stonechild Inquiry, supra, at note 34, Part 2, Creation of the Inquiry, Terms of Reference, Stonechild Inquiry at 4. Among the Commission’s mandate the first of five elements set out the authority necessary to address the soft-underbelly of race:

The Commission of Inquiry appointed pursuant to this Order will have the responsibility to inquire into any and all aspects of the circumstances that resulted in the death of Neil Stonechild and the conduct of the investigation into the death of Neil Stonechild for the purpose of making findings and recommendations with respect to the administration of criminal justice in the province of Saskatchewan. The Commission shall report its findings and make such recommendations, as it considers advisable.
directly addressed racism. Surface efforts, like hiring Indigenous police officers, to tacitly address a deep and complicated issues like racism may polish the surface but are largely ineffective at challenging racism. None of the recommendations specifically address colonialism.\footnote{In the aftermath of the Stonechild Inquiry, the Saskatoon Police has changed its Chief of Police more than once. Since the current Chief of Police Clive Weighill began his term, however, the police force has worked to not only implement the recommendations of the Inquiry but also to engage the Indigenous population in Saskatoon and Saskatchewan more broadly. For example, see T. Piller “Tenth Anniversary of Stonechild Inquiry” at http://globalnews.ca/news/1636631/tenth-anniversary-of-neil-stonechild-inquiry/}

Once a master narrative has been formed, it is difficult to alter. Laws, policies, procedures, the very rules of evidence and practice of courts, tribunals and inquiries are pressed into service to uphold the narrative.\footnote{N. Phillips, Thomas B. Lawrence and Cynthia Hardy “Discourse and Institutions,” (2004) \textit{Academy of Management Review} 29(4), 635–52 at 644.} The story can sometimes even be devious enough to seek a co-option of Indigenous Peoples within the system as though to offer a seal of approval. The Stonechild Inquiry recommended more Indigenous Peoples be made police officers – likely with a view to drawing Indigenous influences into the police force and possibly promote a cross-cultural understanding with a more diverse workplace. It seems aimed at somehow balancing the scales as if to say one life taken in the name of colonialism or racism can be neutralized by the hiring of a few representatives within an offending institution. This tactic allows for a veneer of change on the surface while the real offenses, namely the widespread acceptability of violent colonist regimes to act to simmer unaddressed. To complicate it further, without any confrontation and redress of institutional racism or the colonialism that underpins it all, such actors – in this instance new Indigenous police recruits – may at once find themselves propelling the tenets of a colonial power structure while simultaneously being singled out as legitimizing it.172

2.4.5 Lessons from Stonechild

There are important cautions arising from this assessment of the Stonechild Inquiry for the Tribunal to consider with respect to the Caring Society Complaint. For example, care should be taken so as to not minimize actions with direct dire consequences as mere “administrative shortcomings” solved by a straightforward, common sense remedial approach to complicated issues. With a finding of discrimination but without the ordering of systemic remedies aimed at actually changing the system itself, the socio-economic gap will remain firmly entrenched. Remedies focused solely on the easiest fixes by adding more First Nation administrators and front-line workers should be minimized in favour of remedies that actually address the colonialist underpinnings of the system that allowed for the taking of First Nation children in the first instance, which are examined further in Chapter 4.

Canada’s legal system as built upon a story that claims the Crown is legally dominant over Indigenous Peoples.173 In particular, the identification of Indigenous Peoples, since the arrival of the first wave of the settler population, as noble savages – deviant, backward outsiders with a natural predisposition toward violence, has been an important feature of this narrative.174 When such racialised assumptions are processed through legal discourse the cultural assumptions are too often translated as white 173 Thobani, supra, note 42.

174 Ibid, at 5.
supremacy under the guise of common sense,\textsuperscript{175} which allows for the ongoing maintenance of an approved legal order.\textsuperscript{176}

The Canadian legal apparatus is vast. It includes state actors, such as police lawyers as well as institutions such as courts and tribunals who through judgments and rulings continuously influence the discourse of truth,\textsuperscript{177} enshrined in liberal values of neutrality and fairness.\textsuperscript{178} The entanglement of Indigenous Peoples within legal discourse does not just happen with the police – as with Neil Stonechild – but with legal institutions as well. Colonization of Indigenous lands required racist assumptions that Indigenous Peoples were not equal to the European settlers.\textsuperscript{179} This hierarchical ordering of race continues to influence how Indigenous Peoples are treated by the Canadian legal apparatus. Framing Indigenous Peoples as less trustworthy and continuing to uphold those initial wrongful assumptions continue to persist.\textsuperscript{180} By way of caution then, should the Tribunal find discrimination, it should name colonialism and create remedies that seek not only to establish equal funding for all Canadian children in care but also counter the assumptions of white supremacy that led to colonization in the first place.

The outcome of the Stonechild Inquiry reflects a long history of treating Indigenous peoples as less than human. The Royal Commission on Indigenous Peoples notes that building the “savage” stereotype of Indigenous Peoples was a key colonial policy in the 1830's – encouraged in large part by the existence and growth of settlers and the rise of a new economy dependent upon the claiming of land itself and land-based resources as belonging to the “civilized” settlers:

\textsuperscript{180} \textit{Ibid.}

More and more, non-Aboriginal immigrants were interested in establishing permanent settlements on the land, clearing it for agricultural purposes, and taking advantage of the timber, fish and other resources to meet their own needs or to supply markets elsewhere. They were determined not to be frustrated or delayed unduly by those who claimed title to the land and used it in the Aboriginal way. In something of a return to earlier notions of the “civilized” and “savage” uses of land, Aboriginal people came to be regarded as impediments to productive development.¹⁸¹

Fast forward over a hundred and eighty years and we witness the success of this policy in the Stonechild Inquiry wherein not a single recommendation was directly at eradicating colonialist assumptions that Indigenous Peoples are a lesser form of human and are simply in the way.¹⁸² Meanwhile, the Minister of Justice – findings to the contrary – has the temerity to proclaim “[o]ne of the targets of s.15 and human rights legislation generally has been racism,” which may be true – but certainly was not in the Stonechild Inquiry. This bold attempt to relate the very process of inquiry to human rights and anti-racism, is ironic at best and a perpetuation of Canada’s colonial myth. A similar process resulted in the initial dismissal of the Caring Society Complaint on the grounds there is no comparator group to First Nation children on-reserve in care, as I will discuss further in Chapter 3.

Either way, a Tribunal finding issue with Canada’s child welfare system regarding First Nation children on reserves as merely administrative in nature holds no value in closing the socio-economic gap but rather serves as cover for the status quo. How can ¹⁸¹ Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, 1996, Vol. 1, Ch. 5.

Indigenous Peoples find justice when colonization and racism are perpetuated through a master narrative that skates over evidence, testimony and expert witnesses to conclude a Salteaux teenager’s death at the hands of the police was ‘administrative’ in nature? Ultimately, settler-colonialism “continues to be the backbone of some ferocious systems of domination.” Thus, when examining the merits of the Caring Society’s Complaint, the Tribunal should be alive to the underpinnings of colonialism. Although particularly focused on a discriminatory funding regime, the Caring Society Complaint targets the premise that Indigenous Peoples are not fully people, deserving of dignity.

2.5 Resisting the Master Narrative

There is ongoing resistance to by Indigenous Peoples to the master narrative. For example, in 1969, the federal government produced the so-called White Paper calling for the assimilation of Indigenous Peoples, which gave rise to an almost immediate First Nation response resulting in the formation of the National Indian Brotherhood, now known as the Assembly of First Nations. Similarly, responding to mounting concerns about the environment and socio-economic exclusion by government, Idle No More rose to national attention as a peaceful means to resist further settler-colonial intrusion. The Caring Society Complaint joins this resistance by seeking a finding of discrimination and by demanding that settler-colonialism is named.

Resistance can have results. In contrast to the Stonechild Inquiry, which failed to squarely address colonialist assumptions and overt racism, which led to Stonechild’s death, other inquiries have adopted a different approach. For example, the 1989 Marshall Inquiry examined racism in the Canadian legal system after Donald Marshall Jr. – a Mi’kmaq man – was wrongfully imprisoned for eleven years on murder charges. The Inquiry revealed the Crown assumed because Marshall was Indigenous he was guilty and intentionally failed to disclose key evidence that did not support the charges against Marshall. The Inquiry resulted in a ruling of the Supreme Court with respect to the Commission’s investigation powers relating to Cabinet privilege;\textsuperscript{187} payment to Marshall; and in amendments to Canada’s \textit{Evidence Act}, requiring new disclosure provisions for the Crown.\textsuperscript{188}

---

The Manitoba Justice Inquiry (“MJI”) was commissioned in 1991 to examine the relationship between Indigenous Peoples and the province’s legal system. The MJI final report boldly declared that “[i]n law, with law, and through law, Canada has imposed a colonial system of government and justice upon our people without due regard to our treaty and Indigenous rights. We respect law that is fair and just, but we cannot be faulted for denouncing those laws that degrade our humanity and rights as distinct peoples.”\textsuperscript{189} Refusing to consider the relationship between the province and Indigenous Peoples solely within the confines of Canada’s master narrative, the Manitoba Justice Inquiry offered a critique of the deeply entrenched colonialism in Canada’s legal system. Moreover, it did so citing cornerstone principles of Canadian law; namely fairness and justice.\textsuperscript{190}

\begin{footnotes}
\item\textsuperscript{187} R. \textit{v.} Marshall [1999] 3 SCR 45.
\item\textsuperscript{188} Royal Commission on the Donald Marshall, Jr., Prosecution, Digest of Findings and Recommendations, http://novascotia.ca/just/marshall_inquiry/_docs/Royal%20Commission%20on%20the%20Donald%20Marshall%20Jr%20Prosecution_findings.pdf.
\item\textsuperscript{190} \textit{Ibid.}
\end{footnotes}
By doing so, the MJI set out a mutual meeting place by which to address the gap in the relationship between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians. Though it does not happen often enough, it is possible for inquiries to challenge the master narrative and offer considered recommendations for change. In this way, MJI offers a model of openly addressing colonialism and unravelling the carefully woven myth that Indigenous Peoples are second-class citizens, as a route to a finding of discrimination. Should the evidence support it, the Tribunal may also identify the role of settler-colonialism in allowing the discrimination against First Nation children on-reserves and consider remedies aimed at closing the gap.

As the Manitoba Justice Inquiry demanded, the legal system has to fundamentally change in order to stem the flow of incarceration of Indigenous Peoples. To that end, a new story must be told. But how do we find a new narrative? To start, Canada’s judges, commissioners and adjudicators have the authority and responsibility to interpret Canada’s international obligations in domestic venues. This is not novel. Given the pervasiveness of Canada’s own master story, the myth that the Crown is sovereign over Indigenous Peoples may best be critiqued by drawing upon international perspectives that allow for a less self-reinforcing narrative. The 1996 Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples also served to resist the colonialist narrative and sought to seed a new, more inclusive Canadian narrative through its recommendations, such as Indigenous self-
The themes of RCAP are carried forward in the Calls to Action and Reports of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. The TRC proposes steps to be taken in order to confront Canadian history and strive to remedy ongoing damage caused by colonization. While the dominant myth prevails, there are rich veins of perspective for the Tribunal to consider in the Caring Society Complaint and addressing First Nations child welfare. There is also an international perspective that is helpful in seeing Canada from a more global perspective as evidenced through Canada’s international commitments relating to Indigenous Peoples and human rights.

2.6 Marks on Paper

2.6.1 Overview

Almost two centuries after the Royal Proclamation, post-Second World War peace efforts culminated in commitments to the protection of human rights declared by many nations, including Canada, which sought to prevent a repetition of the War’s atrocities inextricably linked to white supremacy. As a result a forged set of human values took hold in the form of newly articulated values and ideals; resulting in language, such as ‘human rights’ entering the international lexicon with a resounding flourish. By 1948 the then newly formed United Nations crafts and adopts the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. At the time of enactment, the Declaration was so foundational in the codification of human rights that it served “directly and indirectly as a model for many domestic constitutions, laws, regulations, and policies that protect fundamental human rights,”\textsuperscript{199} including section 15 of the \textit{Charter}. The influence of human rights was potent enough to be sustained between 1948 and 1982 when Canada’s \textit{Constitution Act}\textsuperscript{200} was drafted.

But how, are the principles of human rights – intended to be universal – applied toward Indigenous Peoples\textsuperscript{201} in Canada when the decision-making authority exerted to render such decisions over unconquered people is founded in colonialist style myth-building in order to support the master narrative?\textsuperscript{202} How might the principles of human rights found in the \textit{Declaration} and Canada’s master narrative play out before the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal with respect to First Nation children and the role of the Crown?

\textbf{2.6.2 Canada & UNDRIP}

In 1982, a United Nations’ Working Group was struck and by 1985 commenced the drafting of what would become United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (“UNDRIP”).\textsuperscript{203} The document was completed in 2007 and formally passed the United Nation’s General Assembly with 144 votes, thereby setting “the minimum standards for survival, dignity and well-being of the indigenous peoples of the world.”\textsuperscript{204} Despite its seat on the UN’s Human Rights Council, which endorsed the document, Canada refused to sign, as did the United States, Australia and New Zealand –

\begin{flushright}
\begin{footnotesize}
\textsuperscript{200} \textit{The Constitution Act, 1982}, being Schedule B to the \textit{Canada Act 1982 (UK)}, 1982, c 11.
\textsuperscript{202} For a discussion on the tension in the relationship between the Constitution and Aboriginal people, see J. Borrows \textit{“(Ab)Originalism and Canada’s Constitution”} (2012) 58 S.C.L.R. (2d), 351. See also Slattery, \textit{supra}, note 23 and McNeil, \textit{supra}, [Aboriginal Title] at note 45.
\textsuperscript{203} UNDRIP, \textit{supra}, note 116.
\textsuperscript{204} \textit{Ibid}, Article 43.
\end{footnotesize}
\end{flushright} all countries that declared sovereignty over Indigenous Peoples and built similar master narratives that continue to thrive on colonization.

Australia and New Zealand have now signed the document – along with Canada – though Canada’s distinct position is that UNDRIP must not interfere with law.

Canada’s primary concern was a diminishment of its own political autonomy, a euphemism for continuing its colonialist regime unabated. Prior to ratification, Canada sought to have various articles within UNDRIP removed, particularly those relating to self-determination. Indigenous Peoples refused to change the wording of the document on the basis that UNDRIP only provided to Indigenous Peoples the rights already enjoyed by settler colonialists. After three years of wrangling, Canada conceded – sort of. By 2010 Canada announced its agreement in principle with UNDRIP but so there would be no doubt as to Canada’s position, the government released a Statement of Support. The Statement qualified Canada’s international commitment by pronouncing UNDRIP as

---

205 M. Georgis and Nicole VT Lugosi’s "(Re) inserting Race and Indigeneity in International Relations Theory: A Post-colonial Approach," Global Change, Peace & Security 26, no. 1 (2014): 71-88, is an example of when international relations theory continues to be silent with respect to colonization and a colonial legacy or post-colonial theory. Drawing on the premise of this article with respect to UNDRIP, it is not a surprise that these four countries in particular then would be resistant to the document’s content.

208 UN General Assembly, 2007b, 12-13, records that when UNDRIP was presented for a ratification vote by member states, Canada’s Ambassador John McNee stated Canada’s objections before the General Assembly as follows:

> Canada has significant concerns with respect to the wording of the current text, including the provisions on lands, territories and resources; on free, prior and informed consent when used as a veto; on self-government without recognition of the importance of negotiations; on intellectual property; on military issues; and on the need to achieve appropriate balance between the rights and obligations of indigenous peoples, Member States and third parties.

211 Considerable political pressure was brought against Canada from various Indigenous groups, such as the Assembly of First Nations, along with various human rights groups and grassroots organizations. Among the more persuasive arguments for Canada to sign UNDRIP was a letter signed by Canada’s own constitutional and legal experts, “Open Letter—UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Canada Needs to Implement This New Human Rights Instrument,” NationTalk, May 1, 2008, http://nationtalk.ca/story/open-letter-un-declaration-on-the-rights-of-indigenous-peoples-canada-needs-to-implement-this-new-human-rights-instrument/.

212 Canada’s UNDRIP Statement, supra, note 206.
aspirational rather than customary international law.\textsuperscript{213} In other words, Canada may one day respect the rights of Indigenous Peoples – just not yet. For now, it is a placeholder on a national wish list. The Reports of TRC\textsuperscript{214} and its accompanying Calls to Action,\textsuperscript{215} call upon Canada to give meaning to UNDRIP but the resistance of the former Conservative government remains steadfast.\textsuperscript{216}

The \textit{Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties},\textsuperscript{217} to which Canada is a signatory, requires Canada to act in good faith and refrain from any conduct or omission that would serve to defeat the purpose and object of a treaty is a reason for Canada to resist signing. Canada is bound by the \textit{Vienna Convention} to uphold the terms of the United Nations’ \textit{Charter of Human Rights}. Unilaterally diluting the UNDRIP from customary international law to an aspirational document offends the \textit{Vienna Convention} in meaning and spirit.

\textsuperscript{214} Honoring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future, wherein the Commission states at page 202 that Canada’s resistance to fully accepting UNDRIP in Canadian law means Canada will no longer be able to rely upon the Doctrine of Discovery, which is a violation under Article 7, to uphold the legal fiction that all land title vests with the Crown; http://www.trc.ca/websites/trcinstitution/File/2015/Honouring_the_Truth_Reconciling_for_the_Future_July_23_2015.pdf.

\textsuperscript{216} Shortly within the completion of this thesis Stephen Harper’s Conservative Party of Canada was defeated by Justin Trudeau’s Liberal Party of Canada, the latter of whom won a majority of Parliamentary seats. Part of the Liberal Party of Canada’s election platform related to UNDIP, by stating the formulation of a new nation-to-nation relationship with Canada’s Indigenous Peoples and in particular stated its commitment to Indigenous rights, which can be found here: https://www.liberal.ca/liberal-statement-anniversary-declaration-rights-indigenous-peoples/. Time will tell if the Liberal Party of Canada reverses the current federal government resistance and implements UNDRIP.

\textsuperscript{217} 23 May 1969, 1155UNTS 331, Can TS 1980 No 37, Articles 18 and 26 state, respectively:

\begin{itemize}
  \item A State is obliged to refrain from acts which would defeat the object and purpose of a treaty when:
    \begin{itemize}
      \item It has signed the treaty or has exchanged instruments constituting the treaty subject to ratification, acceptance or approval, until it shall have made its intention clear not to become a party to the treaty; or \item It has expressed its consent to be bound by the treaty, pending the entry into force of the treaty and provided that such entry into force is not unduly delayed.
    \end{itemize}
  \end{itemize}
Terms contained within UNDRIP such as consent, self-government and respect for culture are not optional for Canada if the socio-economic gap will ever be closed. There is an a parallel avoidance of responsibility with respect to Canada’s conduct relating to UNDRIP and the behavior of the Stonechild inquiry where colonialism is entirely ignored and racism is tacitly addressed. International legal obligations in UNDRIP are reduced to possibilities merely by issuing a statement to that effect. Once again, important opportunities to revise the master narrative are lost as Canada continues to treat Indigenous Peoples as inside outsiders. Given Canada’s normalized failure to live up to obligations in treaties with Indigenous people, Canada’s UNDRIP position should perhaps not be surprising. With respect to the Complaint, UNDRIP supports the right to identify with an Indigenous Nation as a citizen and a right to culture. The Caring Society Complaint is also concerned with what is taken from Indigenous Nations when young citizens are taken and what is stolen from the child and their families by denying access to culturally relevant care. Why then, would Canada bother with UNDRIP?

In an age where international trade is tantamount to domestic economic success, it is generally accepted that state actors (governments) alter their identity based on

---

218 UNDRIP, supra, note 116.
220 Ibid, Articles 5 and 8.
221 As set out by Audrey Macklin in “Historicizing Narratives of Arrival: The Other Indian Other,” Storied Communities: Narratives of Contact and Arrival in Constituting Political Community, H. Lessard, R. Johnson and J. Webber (eds.), (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2011) at page 30, Canada has consistently maintained that “jurisdiction over the lands belongs to the settlers,” which has in turn been upheld by successive governments and the courts over the years. Further, in his book, First Nations? Second Thoughts, Tom Flanagan – former Conservative advisor and political strategist – conveniently reinvents facts to conform neatly with a colonialist master narrative by recasting the First Nation/Canada treaties at 134-135 as thus:

_Treaties are an aspect of the state system […] From this perspective, it is clear that the many agreements made over the centuries between Indians, on the one hand, and Great Britain or Canada, on the other, are not treaties in the international sense. They could not be, because, as shown earlier in this book, Indians were not organized into states and did not possess sovereignty in the technical sense. Great Britain, and then Canada, as the successor state to Britain, have always upheld their own sovereignty by right of discovery and prescription, and they have both regarded Indian tribes as subject people._

222 UNDRIP, supra, note 116, Articles 2 and 6.
international institutions so as to appear valuable on the international stage and draw more influence and thereby trade.\textsuperscript{223} Signing international customary documents, such as declarations and conventions increases a state’s international standing and overall reach. Similarly, violating international agreements decreases influence.\textsuperscript{224} With all but the United States having signed UNDRIP, Canada joined the international community by appearing supportive of Indigenous Peoples’ rights.\textsuperscript{225} In this way, in order to continue to exert influence and not find itself at a foreign policy disadvantage, it is in Canada’s interest to have domestic laws and policies in place that make room for and respect Indigenous Peoples in a meaningful way.\textsuperscript{226} Indeed, Canada’s banks, whose business is also conducted on the international stage, have already signed the voluntary Equator Principles,\textsuperscript{227} which require the ‘free, prior and informed consent’ of Indigenous Peoples relating to, among other things, financing in mining and extraction industry operations. Canada should consider its position carefully before its current anti-UNDRIP strategy results in diminishing returns on the international stage for both country and economy.

There is no getting around the way that Canada’s adoption of UNDRIP formally recognizes Indigenous Peoples and their distinct status along with an international obligation to protect and promote their human rights.\textsuperscript{228} Perhaps unsurprisingly, to date there has been little progress in Canada towards the implementation of UNDRIP by any

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{224} \textit{Ibid}, Wendt.
  \item \textsuperscript{225} Joffe, \textit{supra}, note 213.
  \item \textsuperscript{226} T. Dunne and Nicholas J. Wheeler, \textit{Human Right in Global Politics} (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999), at 14.
\end{itemize}
measure. In 2004, then UN Special Rapporteur on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, Rodolfo Stavenhagen, visited Canada and reported “unacceptable gaps between [indigenous] Canadians and the rest of the population in educational attainment, employment and access to basic social services.” Though a number of recommendations were included in Stavenhagen’s report, none were implemented as evidenced by the 2013 follow-up visit by then Special Rapporteur on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, Dr. James Anaya, who in turn declared Canada faces a crisis when it comes to the human rights situation of Indigenous Peoples. Anaya’s official report echoed the concerns of Stavenhagen from a decade earlier and reaffirmed a continuation of the same human rights violations against Indigenous Peoples. Anaya stated the range of violations ran the gamut from disrespect for treaty and land rights to unaddressed violence against Indigenous women and girls, access to health care, housing, education, safe drinking water to the welfare and protection of Indigenous children. Anaya expressed serious concern for the lack of sufficient and proper consultations with Indigenous Peoples in order for Canada to obtain the necessary free, prior and informed consent – particularly in relation to resource extraction – required under Article 10 of UNDRIP.

2.6.3 International Agreements in Domestic Courts

In spite of the Canadian government’s seeming refusal to fully operationalise human rights when it comes to Indigenous Peoples; its hostile treatment of international human rights experts; the general disdain for international reports on Canada’s human rights record; and, the casting of UNDRIP as an aspirational versus legal document, we can find some hope in the way the Supreme Court of Canada has been considering international obligations in the context of human rights. Recently, in Tsilhqot’in, the Supreme Court determined that the Crown breached its duty to consult with Indigenous Peoples in relation to Indigenous title lands. While the court did not consider UNDRIP’s Article 10 requiring “free, prior and informed consent” of Indigenous Peoples with respect to land issues, Tsilhqot’in moves the law a step closer insofar as Indigenous title further entrenches and protects the land rights of Indigenous Peoples as set out in UNDRIP. The case creates a form of Indigenous title similar to provincial title, in that it cannot be sold off and the future benefit of the land by generations to come must be considered. Similarly, in Grassy Narrows, the Supreme Court of Canada extended the doctrine of honour and duty to consult to include the provincial Crowns, thereby further entrenching the requirement to obtain “free, prior and informed consent” regardless of the division of powers in the Constitution, 1867.

In Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), an appeal against deportation based on the position of Baker’s Canadian born children, the Supreme Court held procedural fairness required the decision-maker to consider international law and convention, in this instance the United Nations’ Convention on the Rights of the Child. The Court held the Minister’s decision should follow the values found in 235 Tsilhqot’in, supra, note 117.

---

236 Ibid, at 294, para. 74.
238 For more on the doctrine of the duty to consult see: Haida Nation, supra at note 23.
international human rights law. Similarly, UNDRIP should be considered by the Tribunal if it wants to openly confront whether First Nations children can expect fairness in a human rights regime designed without Indigenous participation. Baker authorizes the Tribunal to be ‘fair and just’ by drawing on best principles in international human rights relating to Indigenous Peoples, namely the principles found in UNDRIP.

Still it is important to exercise caution. To truly build a new narrative and maintain international standing, the courts, commissions, inquiries and tribunals should carefully consider how they are using international documents and be on guard so as not to only use them to bolster predetermined conclusions, of Crown sovereignty or settler population dominance, which may merely end up further entrenching Canada’s master narrative to the continued exclusion of Indigenous Peoples. If this approach is taken, Canada’s adoption of UNDRIP may be reshaped into a vehicle that maintains status quo when it comes to Indigenous Peoples while wrapping the nation up in a cloak of liberal values such as inclusivity and equality – the language of human rights used for human wrong.

240 A.F. Bayefsky, International Human Rights Law: Use in Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms Litigation (Toronto: Butterworths, 1992), at 89, wherein the author argues that at least insofar as the Court considers labour relation cases and international labour agreements that “the Court considers international law where it is supportive of a predetermined conclusion but ignores it when it is not.” Therein lies a danger – particularly to the well steeped story of Crown sovereignty over Aboriginal Peoples that the Courts may turn to international agreements for the purposes of supporting the subversion of rights of Aboriginal Peoples in favour of the rights of the settler population whom too often the Court seems reluctant to imposition.

241 Borrows, supra, note 136; see also, Joffe, supra, at note 213.

2.7 The Canadian Human Rights Act Amendments & First Nation

2.7.1 Collective, Government & Individual Rights

In 2008, Canada announced amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act ("CHRA"), which took effect in 2010. Prior to 2008, section 67 of the CHRA stated: “[n]othing in this Act affects any provision of the Indian Act or any provision made under or pursuant to that Act." By way of operation, s.67 explicitly shielded the federal government and First Nation governments from complaints of discrimination relating to actions arising from or pursuant to the Indian Act. Initially, it was argued section 67 was a necessary measure when inserted in 1977 in light of the government’s undertaking not to revise the Indian Act pending the conclusion of ongoing consultations with the National Indian Brotherhood and others on broad Indian Act reform. It was part of an agreement to change nothing until the problems inherent in the Indian Act itself were addressed. Given the Indian Act, among other things, defines who is an Indian and who is not, the Act subsequently also determines who among Indigenous Peoples have rights and who do not. For example, prior to 1985 amendments, the Indian Act provided that Indian women lost status upon marriage to a non-Indian while non-Indigenous women marrying a registered Indian man gained status. Meanwhile, the Indian status of men and their children was not affected by marriage though the status of Indian women and 245 The National Indian Brotherhood, formed in 1968 to represent registered First Nations people, became the Assembly of First Nations in 1982.

their children was revoked. Forcing Indian women to forgo their Indian status upon marriage to a non-Indian offends Articles 1, 2, 6 and 8 of UNDRIP, which allows for Indigenous Peoples to have access to fundamental freedoms, be free from discrimination, claim their own identity, nationality, culture and not to be subjected to forced assimilation, respectively.

2.7.2 Not Everyone Is In Favour of CHRA Amendments

Eliminating s.67 of the CHRA allowed First Nation people to sue the federal government and their own First Nation governments for acts of discrimination – a first in Canadian history. The Indigenous community itself was divided on these changes. To some it heralded progress by finally allowing Indigenous Peoples access to the human rights already enjoyed by Canadians. To others change represented a further erosion of the collectively forged laws of Indigenous Peoples by introducing the language and law of individual rights.

---

249 Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act prior to 1985 allowed for gender discrimination. In 1985 amendments were made to the Indian Act that no longer removed an Indian woman’s status if she married a non-Indian man but the amendments did not address the gender discrimination already suffered by countless Aboriginal women who lost their Indian status prior to 1985. Sharon McIvor, an Aboriginal woman who lost status prior to 1985 on the basis of marriage to a non-Indian man, brought a civil claim against Canada, McIvor v. The Registrar, Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, 2007 BCSC 827, which was ultimately decided by the British Columbia Court of appeal (and denied leave for the Supreme Court of Canada). Though the decision allowed for McIvor to regain her status and status for her children but ultimately the Court did not entirely accept McIvor’s legal arguments and ended up transferring the discrimination by another generation.

251 Ibid, at 1. In a presentation to the First Nations Constitutional Circle in Montreal in February 1992, the QNWA stated:

It must be clearly understood that we have never questioned the collective rights of our Nations, but we strongly believe that as citizens of these Nations, we are also entitled to protection. We maintain that the individual rights of Native Citizens can be recognized while reaffirming collective rights. This is why we would like to be in a position to rely on a Charter guaranteeing the rights and freedoms of all Native Citizens.

2.7.3 CHRA Amendments & the Indian Act

It is a well-established principle of modern statutory interpretation that exceptions to quasi-constitutional human rights legislation are to be narrowly construed. Accordingly, the application of the CHRA by the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal and the courts has turned on whether the Indian Act, or regulations or by-laws made under the Indian Act, give the federal government and First Nation governments express authority to undertake the contested action or decision. If so, even in complaints where the discrimination was obvious or egregious, s.67 operated to prevent the Tribunal’s review. Setting aside the discrimination written into the Indian Act itself, and in spite of s.67, a handful of complaints have been successfully filed with the Tribunal where the alleged discrimination did not fall within the federal government or First Nation’s government’s authority under the Indian Act. These cases illustrate that s. 67 did not fully shield discriminatory actions or decisions of the federal or First Nation governments. In other complaints, however, the authority of the Indian Act has operated as a protection for federal and First Nation governments in what would otherwise be considered human 255 Even now, the Indian Act, requires any Indian child of a certain age living on reserve or on public land (S.C. 1956, c. 40, s. 1; R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6, s. 4(3); R.S.C. 1985, c. I-5, s. 4(3)) to attend such school as the federal Minister of Aboriginal Affairs may choose to designate (S.C. 1932-33, c. 42, s. 1; S.C. 1951, c. 29, ss. 113-118; R.S.C. 1952, c. 149, ss. 113-118 as amended by S.C. 1956, c. 40, ss. 28-29 and S.C. 1956, c. 40, s. 30; R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6, ss. 114-119; R.S.C. 1985, c. I-5, ss. 114-119). Notably, throughout the entire period of the Indian Act regime that provides Canada – in particular the Minister of Indian Affairs – so much power and control over the lives of Indian people, the Minister has lacked statutory authority to order that a Protestant Indian child attend a Roman Catholic school or a Roman Catholic child a Protestant school.

---

256 Ibid.
257 In Desjarlais v. Piapot Band No. 75, [1989] 3 F.C. 605 (C.A.), a band council motion of non-confidence resulting in the firing of a band administrator was found not to fall within the section 67 exception, as it was “nowhere, expressly or by implication, provided for by the Indian Act”; in Jacobs v. Mohawk Council of Kahnawake, [1998] 3 C.N.L.R. 68 (CHRT), a similar finding applied to the denial of services funded by the Department of Indian Affairs to persons not within the band’s criteria for membership, as the funding arrangement required the band to provide services according to the Department’s eligibility criteria; in McNutt v. Shubenacadie Indian Band, [1998] 2 F.C. 198 (T.D.), section 67 did not apply to a band council decision on eligibility for social assistance that was not authorized by the Indian Act; in Courtois v. Canada (Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development), [1991] 1 C.N.L.R. 40 (CHRT), section 67 did not apply to a band council “moratorium” on education services for the children of reinstated women, as the council had no authority over such services under the Indian Act.
rights violations.\textsuperscript{258} Expert observers consider the result has been “an inconsistent and arbitrary application of the [CHRA] to the First Nations people, communities and governments that are subject to the Indian Act.”\textsuperscript{259}

\subsection*{2.7.4 Leading Up to the CHRA Amendments}

In 2001, the Canadian Human Rights Review Panel was appointed to conduct a comprehensive review of the CHRA and acknowledged the significant implications of the section 67 issue for Indigenous people. The Panel’s report indicates that different segments of the Indigenous population consulted raised a range of human rights concerns related to the limited availability of government and band programs and services.\textsuperscript{260} Although some participants in the review process argued against the application of the CHRA to Indigenous governing bodies, “all the groups representing Indigenous women asked for the repeal of [the section 67] exception.”\textsuperscript{261} Moreover, echoing the Canadian Human Rights Review Panel, \textit{A Matter of Rights}, also stressed that, “[i]n repealing section 67, it is important to ensure that the unique situation and rights of First Nations are appropriately considered in the process of resolving human rights complaints.” In the Panel’s view, this would best be accomplished by the addition of an interpretive clause to the CHRA in order that “individual claims to be free from discrimination are considered in light of legitimate collective interests.”\textsuperscript{262}

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\setcounter{enumi}{257}
\item In \textit{Laslo v. Gordon Band (Council)}, [2000] F.C.J. No. 1175 (C.A.) (Q.L.), the section 67 exception applied to a band council’s denial of housing to a reinstated First Nations woman that was explicitly authorized by the Indian Act; in \textit{Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (re Prince))}, [1994] F.C.J. No. 1998 (T.D.) (Q.L.), the Court found that the Indian Act authorized a departmental policy requiring First Nations students to attend the school closest to their home.
\item \textit{Ibid}, 129.
\item Morse, \textit{supra}, note 245, at 14.
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
Canadian human rights system\textsuperscript{263} founded on colonialist assumptions of dominance over Indigenous Peoples be trusted – including the consideration of individual claims of discrimination in light of collective rights?

\textbf{2.7.5 Who Decides the Remedies? Appointing CHRA Commissioners}

A key component of trust for the legal system is connected to the process of appointing decision-makers. Competence of national human rights institutions and a guarantee of institutional independence are among the main areas covered by the 1993 Paris Principles. The Paris Principles\textsuperscript{264} are intentionally drafted in broad language to ensure the varying interest of the all parties involved are met while allowing for different systems of human rights protection to continue to exist throughout the world.\textsuperscript{265} Canada’s human rights system, while compliant to the language of the Paris Principles, is not an international leader.\textsuperscript{266}

For example, Canada’s executive appoints commissioners and decision-makers sitting on human rights tribunals versus a public appointments process that is achieved through an act of Parliament\textsuperscript{267} – the latter lending openness and transparency to the process. Further, Canada could, though it does not, require decision-makers and commissioners in the human rights system to report directly to all of Parliament versus the Executive. This approach unnecessarily raises the specter of criticism relating to the \textsuperscript{263} By “human rights system” I refer to commissions, tribunals, courts and other public institutions whose are created through mandate or enabling legislation and are established by Canadian law to both protect and promote human rights.

\textsuperscript{266} \textit{Ibid.}

\textsuperscript{267} \textit{Ibid.}
independence of the human rights system when an open appointment process coupled with an official act of Parliament would significantly remedy such concerns.

2.7.6 Who Does Not Decide the Remedies? No Indigenous Appointments

The appointment process is of considerable importance, particularly in light of the wave of Indigenous complaints on their way to the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal. While the Stonechild and MJI reports recommend increasing the numbers of Indigenous police officers, there is no parallel call for appointing Indigenous decision-makers within the Canadian human rights system. Predictably, the CHRA was amended in 2008, yet there has yet to be an appointment by the Executive who is Indigenous and steeped in an understanding of Indigenous collective rights. If changes were made to the Act in 2008 and subsequent Annual Reports of the Commission provide clear numbers as to the growing volume of Indigenous-based complaints, the Tribunal needs to maintain legitimacy, which may prove difficult, without a single commissioner being possessed of expertise to human rights as it relates to Indigenous laws.

Canada’s less than transparent approach to appointments may, however, be part of a general Canadian trend that leans away from respecting human rights in favour of an open-season attack. Consider the current federal government’s “refusal to admit that there is any serious discrimination or inequality in Canada” or that Canada even has a colonial history. Moreover, the government’s position in reference to the escalating number of murdered and missing Indigenous women in Canada – which continues to

---

270 Ibid, at 21.
271 Harper, supra, note 120.
climb into the thousands – is that the matter is not one of human rights but rather is resolvable through Canada’s national Economic Action Plan. When asked why there is a steadfast refusal to call a national inquiry into the deaths and disappearances of so many Indigenous women, then Prime Minister Stephen Harper simply stated “um it, it isn’t really high on our radar, to be honest.” This is the same government responsible for the appointments of Commissioners to human rights agencies. Could any Indigenous complainant come to reasonably expect fairness by decisions-makers who are not reflective of them within a human rights system that is itself seems under assault? Taken together, these elements do not create the best environment for the Tribunal to use its broad statutory mandate and remedial powers to close the socio-economic gap; to assume risk; to demonstrate respect for Indigenous laws; or even to strive to create something intersocietal. Nonetheless, in accordance with the Caring Society Complaint, human rights generally were not the only ones being squeezed by the Canadian government. First Nation children on reserve have been another ongoing target.

2.8 Some Conclusions

In this chapter I have examined the First Nation Child and Family Caring Society and Assembly of First Nations’ Complaint to the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal and how it offers opportunity to shift the master narrative by addressing colonialist underpinnings

272 In essence, the position of the majority government, which is not being at all effectively challenged by any other party, is that Indigenous women (and by implication, the men who attack them), just need a job and then they somehow magically will no longer find themselves the victims of violence. Though there is considerable criticism in relation to human rights railed against the majority party – which is justifiable and well-earned – there is less criticism about the role of the Official Opposition. For more see: http://www.swt-cfc.gc.ca/violence/effects/action-eng.pdf; J. Jeffries http://www.vice.com/en_ca/read/call-off-the-search-party-conservatives-confirm-mmwiw-have-themselves-to-blame; 273 From an interview aired December 17 on CBC with Peter Mansbridge and then Prime Minister Harper http://www.cbc.ca/news/politics/full-text-of-peter-mansbridge-s-interview-with-stephen-harper-1.2876934. With recent changes in leadership of Canada’s federal government, the Interim Conservative Party leader, Rona Ambrose – replacing the outgoing Stephen Harper – has offered a sudden reversal of position and is now stating the Conservative Party supports an inquiry. For more see: Susana Mas’ article http://www.cbc.ca/news/politics/rona-ambrose-will-support-inquiry-missing-murdered-indigenous-women-1.3308463.
– along with its sibling, racism\textsuperscript{274} and assumptions of white supremacy – through an effective use of remedies. I have cautioned against the Tribunal finding ‘administrative failings’ on the part of Canada since, as seen in Stonechild, these hold little substantive value. Such a finding may lead only to a remedy of funding equality. I have posited that for meaningful resolution, the Tribunal must craft remedies that hold real value in closing the socio-economic gap by acknowledging Canada’s legal legacy of oppressing Indigenous Peoples and addressing the systemic issues which give rise to the Complaint in the first instance – that Indigenous Peoples are not fully people, deserving of dignity. I have also tried to illustrate that if remedies are to be effective, they must be built upon Minaadendamowin – respect for Indigenous Peoples, laws, languages, culture, values, families, children. Respect means something more than a nod. It means making actual substantive change to the power structure of the legal apparatus and crafting remedies that support Indigenous Peoples’ decisions on how best to care for and support Indigenous families and children. I have proposed this might take the form of meaningful appointments to the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal – not just amending s.67, CHRA. Minaadendamowin also means, Canada has to become more transparent in relation to appointments that includes appointees familiar with Indigenous laws.

\textbf{2.8.1 Returning to the valley}\\

Contrary to former Prime Minister Harper’s statement in Pittsburgh at the gathering of world leaders, Canada does indeed have a history of colonialism. It was brutal and violent. It is ongoing. The people of the valley have something to teach us about how we conduct ourselves when faced with difficult problems, such as the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians. Rather than consider why they had lost fire and how their own actions may have contributed to or even caused the problem, the people looked outward and simply took what they believed was rightfully theirs. They had shifted so fundamentally away from being good that they cast aside their obligations and responsibilities. They forgot to live with Minaadendamowin.

\textsuperscript{274} In B. Lawrence and E. Dua, "Decolonizing Antiracism," Social Justice (2005), 120-143, the authors contend that too often Indigenous Peoples and perspectives are left out of anti-racism movements. This ignoring – to the point of exclusion – of Indigenous Peoples in anti-racist contexts typically leaves Indigenous Peoples themselves working against the settler population’s dominance without other marginalized allies who too often experience and fight against incidents of racism.

Likewise, Canada – and every actor on the human rights stage believing themselves to be doing what is right – might give pause and look inward. Continuing to ignore the promises set out in the Royal Proclamation of 1763, of international declarations on human rights and the rights of Indigenous Peoples and other human rights commitments may only perpetuate our current problems. If the very structure of the legal system and the human rights sphere is rooted in colonialism and stands upon assumptions that are wrong in law – such as sovereignty and white supremacy – how might the Canadian human rights regime effectively construct remedies in the Complaint that address systemic issues effecting Indigenous Peoples?

Animikii lashed out at being tricked and his lesson of withholding fire undone.
The great bird remembered the original instructions of the people of the valley and sought a stringent means by which to restore harmony. Closing the gap and reconciling relationships will be difficult and complicated as well as require a drawing in of Indigenous laws to give meaningful effect of any remedies. But right now it is only Indigenous Peoples carrying the burden of the socio-economic gap while Canada continues to live off the lands and resources. Continuing in this way seems to inevitably lead to a day when a higher price will be extracted.
Consider too the continued assumption of sovereignty over Indigenous Peoples who have never been conquered nor ceded sovereignty to the Crown; the deft avoidance of naming colonialism though inquiry after inquiry; the steadfast refusal to admit and fundamentally change colonialist assumptions in law; the turning away from addressing settler colonialism to occasionally renaming it racism wherein Indigenous Peoples are also typically ignored and contribute to their many entanglements with Canadian law. It is helpful to recall that Indigenous Peoples once offered shelter to settlers who gained entry by seeking friendship and peace. Though we know, like the rabbit slipping into Animikii’s nest, there was another agenda, poignantly articulated by Treaty Commissioner Morris in 1882 when he stated, “the queen wishes her red children to learn the cunning of the white man.” Cunning indeed. Until the settler population comes to terms with their original intentions, deception, subsequent obligations, promises and responsibilities, Indigenous Peoples will continue to be lashed with the lightning strikes of colonialism.

The boy thought himself doing good work by stealing fire for his people but he was duplicitous. Similarly, Canada justifies taking Indigenous children and placing them in residential schools or in an underfunded child welfare system because Indigenous people need to be civilized in the ways of the west – as though breaking promises and stealing children is the conduct of the rational and civilized. Recall that the birch was an ally to the boy as Indigenous Peoples were to the first settlers. Might the story remind us what results when we take what is not ours? It does not matter how many lies we tell to justify our actions. What we are really doing is requiring others to bear the scars of an ongoing deception.

---

275 Ibid.
CHAPTER 3 – GWAYAKWAADIZIWIN (HONESTY):
CHILD AND FAMILY CARING SOCIETY

Sihkooseu & Wesukechak

Sihkooseu (weasel) and Wesukechak were once good friends but no more. A great Chief, who loved and cared for his daughter, sent word out that the first suitor able to guess the young woman’s secret name would be wise enough to marry her. Believing the one who first spoke her secret name would be for her, the young woman agreed. Wesukechak, along with many others, decided to enter the contest but Wesukechak is not like everyone else and was determined to win by any means. So, he went to the old net maker, Spider, and asked that he find out the secret name. Agreeing to help – as friends often do for one another – Spider walked up a tall tree, spun a long, silken thread and floated down into the camp of the Chief and his daughter, who were talking about the challenge. In this way, Spider discovered the young woman’s secret name and hurried off to tell his friend.

But the journey back was long and there was no wind to help Spider travel quickly. Worried he would be too late; Spider saw Sihkooseu and enlisted his help. Sihkooseu meant to find Wesukechak and tell him the secret but somewhere along the way as he ran, Sihkooseu thought things over. He decided he liked the idea of marrying the young woman himself more than he liked being friends with Wesukechak. So, 277 Wesukechak (also known as Wiisagejaak, Wisakechahk, Weesakaychak, etc.) is a trickster in Cree culture. He appears in many stories and is a transformer so one never knows when Wesukechak may appear. Often he finds himself on adventures that are full of humour. He is a spirit imbued with powers and a friend to people, sometimes teaching lessons the hard way or that are otherwise difficult to convey. This story was told to me by John Snake in Rama First Nation as part of his efforts to convince me to embark on this research and thesis work. I am grateful to have found a place for it within my thesis. I was not certain for a while – of both a place for the story within my thesis and my thesis itself.

---

Sihkooseu turned around and ran to the Chief’s camp. Upon arrival Sihkooseu declared the young woman’s secret name was Forever-and-Ever. Though surprised, the Chief and his daughter set a date to marry. Sihkooseu was so happy he forgot about his trickery but soon Spider learned what had happened and told Wesukechak all about it.

Angry, Wesukechak ran to the Chief and his daughter. Learning of the deceit the Chief and his daughter were furious with Spider for listening; with Wesukechak for cheating; and with Sihkooseu for his trick. Finding them all at fault, the Chief declared his daughter unbound and free to choose for herself. She chose none of them. Sihkooseu heard about the Chief’s anger and that of his daughter but it was Wesukechak’s ire toward him that frightened him the most. Even now Sihkooseu is afraid of Wesukechak, which is why he runs, stops, listens and runs again, trying to dodge Wesukechak’s vengeance.

3.1 Overview

“When...the [Indian] child lives with his parents who are savages; he is surrounded by savages, and though he may learn to read and write, his habits and training and mode of thought are Indian. He is simply a savage who can read and write.”

– Former Prime Minister John A. MacDonald, (House of Commons Debates, 1883)

In this chapter, I detail the Complaint, which serves to ground this thesis. I then trace the passage of the Complaint through the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal process and subsequent judicial review. I seek to demonstrate Canada’s response to the Complaint was wholly inconsistent with then Prime Minister Harper’s apology on behalf of Canada for the Indian Residential Schools and serves as another example of Canada’s profound inability to express honesty in its relationship with Indigenous Peoples. Along the way, I also consider the actions of Canada in relation to the Chair of the Tribunal and Dr. Cindy Blackstock of the FNCFCS. After exploring these doctrinal and extra-doctrinal happenings, I turn to the ways in which the human rights frame might facilitate or stymie efforts to pursue Indigenous People’s rights and a return to a system in which First Nations people raise their children pursuant to their laws and cultural practices.

Children were so deeply woven into First Nations culture that they quickly became the centerpiece of colonial expansion through assimilation policies. I examine the importance of the Complaint because the raid on First Nations children continues. I also explore Canada’s policy of denial of rights and dignity when it comes to Indigenous Peoples as well as the measures by which Canada is prepared to go to deny as seen by its conduct in response to the Complaint. This chapter examines how room might be made by the Tribunal for the inclusion of Indigenous laws with respect to a systemic remedial order aimed at closing the socio-economic gap. I examine the importance of truth and process as well as the tension between the individual and collective rights of Indigenous Peoples raised within human rights. Finally, in this chapter I consider what is at stake in the Complaint – which is more than equality of funding but also Indigenous legal orders and culture, making the Complaint in some ways precedent setting.

---

279 The Statement of Apology from then Prime Minister Harper, which he declared in the House of Commons on June, 11, 2008 that the residential school era had a “profoundly negative” impact because: [i]t removed and isolated children from the influence of their homes, families, traditions and cultures, to assimilate them into the dominant culture. We now recognize that it was wrong to separate children from the rich and vibrant cultures and traditions, that created a void in many lives and communities and we apologize for having done this. We now recognize that, in separating children from their families...and we apologize for having done this.
3.1.1 Attacking Indigenous Laws Through Indian Residential Schools

The Caring Society Complaint creates an opportunity for the Tribunal to not only equalize funding for child welfare but also narrow the socio-economic gap. The Complaint is deceptive insofar as it may appear on its surface to be a matter of an alleged discrimination in funding but it is deeply rooted in Canada’s colonialist past. The fundamental problem raised by the Complaint is not new nor is it previously unknown to Canada. In 1966, a confidential departmental report of the now Indigenous and Northern Affairs Canada, estimated that 75 percent of the children in Residential Schools were from houses which, by reason of overcrowding and parental neglect or indifference were unfit residences for school children. Though almost forty years ago, by 1966 generations of Indigenous Peoples had already attended Residential Schools, returned to reserves or urban centres and as is the testament of the Residential School initiative, had little experience with healthy, productive family life. Many were trying to recover from the abuse inflicted in the schools and were living in the extreme poverty to which Canada consigned Indigenous Peoples. It is a commonly held misconception that First Nation children are in foster-care to escape physical and sexual abuse. Rather, the escalating numbers of First Nation children in care continues to climb is driven by poverty, which is often viewed as bad parenting versus economic status; poor-housing; and caregiver substance abuse—predictable results from Residential School abuses. In this way, little has changed since the 1966 department report because Canada has not changed how it seeks to resolve the real issues.

---

281 RCAP, supra, note 278, ch.10, p.13.

Canada continues to act as though the problem lies with Indigenous families for poor parenting rather than acknowledge a key contributing factor is the breaking of Indigenous families – in the name of civilizing the savages. Canada continually fails to acknowledge colonialism and the imposition of laws that are not Indigenous as contributing factors to the ongoing systemic crises, such as First Nation children in care. The Complaint seeks to address this by asking the Tribunal to order both a remedy for equal funding and to construct systemic remedies addressing the colonialist underpinnings that sees so many First Nation children enter the child welfare system in the first instance. As we shall see through the testimony of Elder Joseph later in this Chapter, First Nations had systems that care for children and placed them at the center of the community versus shipping them away.

The Complaint recognizes the legacy of the Indian Residential School policy and its impacts on the numbers of First Nation children in foster care, through intergenerational damage, which is explored further in this Chapter. The Complaint is also concerned with the foreseeability of the intergenerational impacts of the abuses at Residential School. This foreseeability raises serious questions about why the same government who created Residential Schools, and later apologized for their role in causing damage and destruction, also continues to fund First Nation child welfare at a rate twenty-two percent lower than what is available on average in the provinces for all other Canadian children.\textsuperscript{285}

---

\section*{3.1.2 Historical Disadvantage}

As demonstrated through various exercises of law and assertions of authority throughout this thesis, the history and difference in funding, assert the complainants, necessitates a finding of historical disadvantage.\textsuperscript{286} Meanwhile, Canada steadfastly denies the funding level is a problem and any responsibility for redress, leaving the costs to be, borne by Indigenous Peoples. The underfunding of a system which is currently removing First Nation children at ten times the rate of removal for all other Canadian children is both part of and perpetuates the legacy\textsuperscript{287} of Indian Residential Schools across additional generations of Indigenous families and communities.\textsuperscript{288} These elements conspire to create an historical disadvantage being lived out by First Nations children and families in Canada.

\section*{3.2 Nature of the Complaint & Legal Process}

\subsection*{3.2.1 Overview}

The Complaint before the Tribunal centers on fundamental human rights principles as well as access to justice for Indigenous Peoples, in particular First Nations children.\textsuperscript{289} The Complaint brings up old questions about the possibilities for using Canadian law

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{285} Report of Parliament’s Standing Committee on Public Accounts, Chapter 4, First Nations Child and Family Services Program – Indian and Northern Affairs Canada of the May 2008 Report of the Auditor General, 40\textsuperscript{th} Parliament, 2\textsuperscript{nd} Session (Ottawa: Communication Canada) (2009), at 5.
\textsuperscript{286} Submissions, First Nation Child and Caring Society, at 18.
\textsuperscript{289} Auditor General of Canada’s Report to the House of Commons, Chapter 4: First Nations Child and Family Services Program – Indian and Northern Affairs Canada (2008).
\end{flushleft}
towards the liberation of Indigenous Peoples. The Complaint is a challenge to colonialis towards Indigenous families and the state’s right to distribute public monies drawn from the very lands and resources wrongfully taken by the Crown; but it does so in a process with ties to that first colonialist root. If the jurisdiction of Indigenous Peoples was respected and the as set out by Dr. Blackstock:

\[E\]quality of their relationships with the Crown were recognized at the center of political and legal relationships, the dichotomy evident in this case between recognition of participatory rights through the delegation of service delivery to First Nations child and family service agencies but not distributive rights would not persist.

3.2.2. An Introduction to Potential Models of Remedy Structure

Negotiations rather than a Complaint would provide the better and likely more comprehensive outcome of addressing the funding discrepancy with respect to both funding care of First Nation children but also structuring a system of culturally accessible and relevant child welfare. Both the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society and the Assembly of First Nations actively sought to negotiate closing the socio-economic gap between the lives of First Nation children living on-reserves and all other Canadian 290 For more on the possibilities of using colonialist processes to decolonize see: A. Lorde, ”The Master’s Tools Will Never Dismantle the Master’s House,” Feminist Postcolonial Theory: A Reader, 25 (2003), 27.

---

291 Blackstock, supra, note 287.
292 Ibid.
293 The First Nation Child & Family Caring Society of Canada is a non-profit entity founded in 1998 as a result of a national meeting of many First Nations child and family service agencies and is Canada’s only national organization serving First Nation children and families. Its mandate is to provide research, policy development and recommendations and professional development for First Nation child and family workers. The Caring Society was foundational in establishing Jordan’s Principle see Blackstock, supra, at note 287 and also Shannen’s Dream – a movement started by Shannen Koostachin before her accidental death in 2010 that advocates for equality in education between Canadian and First Nation children with a focus of building comfortable and safe schools on-reserves.
294 In response to Canada’s 1968 so-called White Paper calling for the assimilation of First Nations people in Canada, the National Indian Brotherhood was formed, which was the predecessor to the Assembly of First Nations, which is a national organization of First Nations in Canada who together elect a National Chief as a means of advocating on the national level for issues impacting First Nations, such as First Nation justice issues, education, health, children and families. The Assembly of First Nations’ offices are in Ottawa.
children. For its part, however, Canada has demonstrated no political will to resolve the problems it has created with respect to First Nation children and families on reserve or off. Consider the Charlottetown and the more recent Kelowna Accords, the latter of which specifically called for unprecedented investments in education and child welfare, while the former more generally addressed First Nation self-government that would include child welfare. Still, willingness to engage in these talks has been rare and usually ends in failure the efforts are real nonetheless. These talks, and failures, form the backdrop to the Complaint, which alleges Canada provides inadequate funding for First Nation child and family services programs leading to an adverse impact in child and family services otherwise available to the Canadian public. The complainants contend this amounts to discrimination within the meaning of section 5, Canada Human Rights Act (“CHRA”). By no means is this complaint alone in alleging discrimination by 295 Continued negotiations and meetings have been held over the course of years between First Nation leadership and Canada by at least three National Chiefs – Matthew Coon Come, Phil Fontaine and Shawn A-in-Chut Atleo. The crisis with First Nation children was and remains a serious concern among First Nations Chiefs who have passed a series of resolutions relating to the problem. It is telling that all of the resolutions spanning over a decade have been adopted by consensus, including resolutions no. 60/2000, Ratification of the National Policy Review concerning First Nations Child and Family Services; no.5/2004, A Call for Immediate Action on the First Nation Child and Family Services Federal Funding Crisis; no.23/2004, First Nation Child & Family Services; no. 53/2006 First Nation Child & Family Services; no 56/2007, Adoption and Custody of First Nations children; no. 14/2008, Emergency Resolution on Child and Family Services; no. 63/2008 Implementation of Jordan’s Principle; no. 36/2011, Support for Child Welfare; and, no. 17/2012 Chiefs Task Force on Child and Family Services.

---

297 The Kelowna Accord was announced in November 2005 and was the most comprehensive modern document negotiated between Canada and Aboriginal organizations. It failed to gain support prior to a federal election, which the subsequent Conservative Party voted against – though it had support among Liberals and New Democratic Party. The Accord called for an investment of over $5 billion over the course of a five-year period aimed specifically at closing the gap between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal Canadians. It included significant investments in health and education of Aboriginal Peoples and would have provided the much needed funding to support healthy Aboriginal families and children. For the full text of the Accord see: http://www.thecanadianencyclopedia.ca/en/article/kelowna-accord/.

299 CHRA, supra, note 16, section 5 provides:

It is a discriminatory practice in the provision of goods, services facilities or accommodation customarily available to the general public:

(a) to deny, or to deny access to, any such good, service facility or accommodation to any individual;or Canada against First Nations. The Canadian Human Rights Commission has reported a surge in human rights complaints filed by Indigenous complainants against Canada and First Nation governments since the 2010 repeal of section 67, CHRA, from less than thirty to over three hundred where the number has remained relatively steady.\footnote{Annual Reports, supra, note 268.}

\textbf{3.2.3 Deny, Deny, Deny...}

Canada’s legal response to the Complaint has been denial of any responsibility for the problem. As we have seen in Chapter 2, Canada’s denial is in keeping with settler-colonialism. Denial is consistent with the outcome of the Stonechild Inquiry, which dismisses hate against Indigenous Peoples as an administrative shortcoming; with Manitoba’s continued jailing of Indigenous Peoples in jaw-dropping numbers while ignoring the Manitoba Justice Inquiry Report recommendations; with allowing Indigenous women and girls to be assaulted, exploited and murdered in astounding numbers while Canada’s offering in response to the crisis is a federal Economic Action Plan.\footnote{In Action Plan to Address Family Violence and Violent Crimes Against Aboriginal Women and Girls (Ottawa: 2014), The Honourable Dr. K. Kellie Leitch, P.C., O.Ont., M.P., Minister of Labour and Minister of Status of Women states in the Forward:

The Action Plan will consolidate and build on existing Government initiatives, and ensure we are using the best tools at our disposal to prevent violence, support victims and protect Aboriginal women and girls...through Economic Action Plan 2014...

The Action Plan centers around investing in skills training for Aboriginal women (at page 8) – on the assumption they just need a legitimate job – and more policing on-reserves (at page 5) – notwithstanding so many of the murdered and missing women disappear from urban centers. For more see Peirce, supra, at note 87. Canada posits the solution is simple economics.}

Canada continues to reject its own data and findings on First Nation child welfare while steadfastly refusing to acknowledge systemic discrimination exists.
3.2.4 Canada’s Trickery and Flawed Logic

While Canada’s main argument is that it merely provides funds and not a service within the meaning of section 5, CHRA, it continues to argue that the lack of a comparator group suggested that there was no discrimination. In addition, by way of response to the initial Complaint, Canada argued the Tribunal should not hear the Complaint on the merits. Since Canada only funds First Nation child welfare on-reserves while provinces fund all other child welfare there are no comparably situated Canadian children. No comparator group, no discrimination and no need to continue to a full hearing. As added measure, no sympathetic Tribunal either.

Further disrupting the process and calling into question the appointments of Tribunal representatives, as explored in Chapter 2, Canada replaced the original Tribunal chair. This was illustrative of Canada’s mounting disdain against Indigenous Peoples and, as set out in this Chapter, the representative who filed the Complaint. Within days of assuming control of the Tribunal and without meeting with the parties, the new chair, Chotalia, vacated all hearing dates. Canada followed with an unsuccessful motion seeking to strike the Complaint.

Overall, Canada vigorously resists that substantive funding equality is owed to First Nations people living on reserve. By way of example, furthering a lack of regard for systemic equality, Canada brought an application arguing the Tribunal has no

---

302 File No. T1340/7008, Notice of Motion of Respondent (Canada) for an Order to dismiss the Complaint.
304 Ibid.
305 Ibid.
jurisdiction\textsuperscript{307} (though interestingly when the Chair vacated hearing dates a few weeks earlier, jurisdiction was not an issue). Finally, in March 2011 – just over four years after the complaint was filed in 2007 – Chair Chotalia dismissed the matter.\textsuperscript{308} The Tribunal found merit in Canada’s position that there cannot be discrimination if there is no comparator group and therefore Canada’s funding could not be discriminatory.\textsuperscript{309}

The comparator group argument raised by Canada rests on a terribly flawed premise. If followed to conclusion and applied to the hundreds of outstanding human rights complaints filed since 2010, First Nation people living on-reserve who identify discrimination in the difference between their access to services or the level at which those services are funded when compared to other Canadians, would be unable to successfully make out a discrimination complaint, because of a lack of a comparator group. Following Canada’s logic, access to human rights will be unavailable to Indigenous Peoples on many occasions in relation to complaints of discrimination related to services of the federal government. This is particularly so because First Nations are a federal responsibility under section 91(24), \textit{Constitution Act, 1867}, while many social services and programs fall within the provinces 92(13) power. Therefore, as the provinces are not responsible for Indians and lands reserved for Indians, a comparator group for Canada’s delivery of a program or service for Indians or on lands reserved for Indians is not possible.

\textsuperscript{307} Notice of Motion, the Attorney General of Canada (representing the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), an Order to dismiss the complaint, December 21, 2009, File No. T-1753-08.
\textsuperscript{308} Ruling, Shirish P. Chotalia, Q.C. (Tribunal Chairperson), March 3, 2011, File No. T-1753-08.
\textsuperscript{309} Ibid.
3.2.5 Let’s Try It Again and Get This Right

On judicial review, different principles prevailed. On April 18, 2012 Justice Mactavish rendered her 107-page decision in favour of the Complainants, which included the Canadian Human Rights Commission, by setting aside Chair Chotalia’s dismissal of the complaint and ordering a newly constituted panel to hear the matter. Canada argued the Tribunal did not dismiss the matter “summarily” but rather on the basis of a hearing on the comparator group issue. On the question of whether the CHRA even permits the Tribunal “to decide an issue that could determine the outcome of a case before embarking on a full hearing on the merits,” Mactavish, J., held that the Tribunal would be able to substantively conclude issues in the Caring Society complaint without hearing all of the evidence on every issue raised. It must, however, be correct in law, and the Tribunal’s conclusion that there was no comparator group hence, no basis for a discrimination complaint was not correct in law. Chair Chotalia concluded the repeal of s.67 of the CHRA had no relevance to the Caring Society complaint because “the amendment merely subjected the Government of Canada and First Nations to the prohibitions against discrimination on prescribed grounds in their provision of services to Indigenous persons.” Subsequently, the Tribunal concluded there was no differentiation and adverse impact in the provision of services by Canada to First Nation 310 Now a Justice of the Federal Court of Canada, Mactavish was former chair of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal in 1998. Her considerable expertise in human rights law is reflected in her Ruling.

311 I note the length of this decision, and later the Federal Court of Appeals decision on Canada’s appeal of Justice Mactavish’s decision because I am of the view that when the court wants to ensure a good decision is rendered that will impact the law, shape something important for years to come, time is taken to craft a careful judgment – such as Justice Mactavish’s. That the Court of appeal took only a few pages to uphold the judicial review provides another message – Justice Mactavish’s decision is correct now get on with the merits of the complaint, Canada.
312 Commission, supra, note 23.
313 Ibid, para. 119.
314 Ibid, para .113.
315 Ibid, para 228.
children on-reserves.\textsuperscript{316} In contrast, Justice Mactavish stated the \textit{CHRA} is quasi-constitutional and as such the Tribunal is mandated to “give effect to the fundamental Canadian value of equality.”\textsuperscript{317} Moreover, human rights complaints are often “the final refuge of the disadvantaged and the disenfranchised.”\textsuperscript{318} This includes Indigenous Peoples in Canada. Given these awesome responsibilities, the Tribunal’s decision on the comparator group question was “unreasonable as it flies in the face of the scheme and purpose of the Act, and leads to patently absurd results that could not have been intended by Parliament.”\textsuperscript{319}

Mactavish J., found the Tribunal’s conduct on dismissing the complaint based on Canada’s ‘lack of a comparator group’ argument without hearing the merits to be unfounded and the Tribunal had compounded the error by failing to provide reasons for its ruling. In addition, Mactavish J., pointed out that in fact there was evidence available that would support comparisons but the Tribunal failed to consider the significance of Canada’s own adoption of provincial child welfare standards through both its First Nation child welfare programming manual (“manual”) and funding policies, such as Directive 20-1.\textsuperscript{320} The combination of the manual, policies and content of Director 20-1 – which, among other things, establishes funding amounts – collude to demonstrate Canada did not merely invent child welfare standards for First Nation children on reserve but rather had built the system based on Canadian children subject to provincial programs and services. Therefore, though a comparator is not required, Canada’s consideration of other Canadian children in provincial child welfare regimes would have sufficed.

\textsuperscript{316} Ibid, para. 229.
\textsuperscript{317} Ibid, para 244; see also \textit{Canada (Attorney General) v. Mossop}, [1993] 1 SCR 554 at 615.
\textsuperscript{319} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{320} Ibid, at paras. 391-395.
Still unwilling to proceed on the merits, Canada appealed Justice Mactavish’s ruling. In a 14-page decision, the Federal Court of Appeal unanimously endorsed Mactavish’s ruling. The whole matter was returned to the Tribunal for a full hearing.

3.2.6 Retaliation and Trickery for Bearing Witness

Even after the benefit of the Federal Court ruling and the decision on appeal, Canada remained aggressive about finding ways to undermine the very access to human rights processes it provided to Indigenous Peoples with its 2008 amendments to the CHRA. In December 2009, the First Nation Child and Family Caring Society of Canada sought to amend its Complaint against Canada to include an additional complaint of retaliation under section 14.1, CHRA against Dr. Blackstock, who was instrumental in bringing the Complaint. The Caring Society alleged that shortly after the initial complaint against Canada in 2007, AANDC officials set about to bar her from meetings with Canadian officials and Indigenous leadership. Prior to the Caring Society’s complaint, Canada itself had sought Dr. Blackstock’s expertise on child welfare issues. The Caring Society further alleged that Canada’s conduct prevented Dr. Blackstock from providing services to child welfare agencies seeking her expertise. Internal government emails Indian and Northern Affairs Canada (INAC) and the Department of Justice substantiated the claim that they colluded to monitor Dr. Blackstock’s private Facebook page and Twitter account in an effort to discover “other motives” for filing the initial 321 Canada, supra, note 22.

---

323 Closing Submissions, First Nation Child and Family Caring Society, paras. 40-44.
In October 2012, the Tribunal allowed the amendment of the original Complaint, saying any other decision would “permit the respondent [the Attorney General of Canada] to engage in retaliation against representatives of charitable organizations that have filed complaints on behalf of victims.”

The evidence ultimately supported the retaliation component, for which the Tribunal awarded the maximum penalty of $20,000 in favour of the Caring Society for “pain and suffering as well as for willful and reckless misconduct.” Though disappointing the Tribunal did not find a broader problem within the government that would allow for such retaliation against Dr. Blackstock, when it comes to a finding on the merits of the Complaint, there remains a lot at stake for how the Tribunal may craft effective systemic remedies.

3.2.7 Making Room in Canada’s Laws for Indigenous Peoples to Bring Challenges

Canada amended the CHRA in 2008 with the stated intent of making domestic human rights accessible to Indigenous Peoples that are already enjoyed by non-Indigenous Canadians. In other words, making more room for Indigenous Peoples to access Canada’s laws. Yet when the first complaint makes its way through the human rights system, as we have seen, Canada’s response is denial. The Caring Society \[325\] First Nations Child and Family Caring Society, supra, note 322, para 11.

\[326\] Ibid. at para. 11. Though outside the parameters of this thesis, consider too that since 2012, Canada is attempting to minimize its future exposure in relation to child welfare and charitable organizations filing future complaints by simply denying or taking away charitable status of various organizations. See Dean Beeby, CBC News, Giving Tree Foundation to be Stripped of Charity Status, http://www.cbc.ca/news/politics/giving-tree-foundation-to-be-stripped-of-charity-status-1.3074967. Less charities means less risk of a human rights complaint being filed on behalf of victims. Giving Tree Foundation is a child welfare focused charity.

\[327\] The Tribunal, however, found that since the conduct giving rights to the substance of the retaliation complaint was restricted to Dr. Blackstock and not a systemic issue of retaliatory behavior on the part of government against individuals for filing human rights complaints, there were no remedial orders for training of government employees. See FNCFCS, supra, note 324.

\[328\] Ibid.
complaint filed “on behalf of all First Nations children who want the same opportunity to live safely in their family homes as other children.” 329 In spite of Canada’s practice of denial, the Complaint was heard by a newly constituted Tribunal panel starting February 25, 2013 and concluding after thirteen weeks of hearing dates in October of 2014. But as previously stated, this Complaint is not only about equality of funding but also creating effective systemic remedies and making room for Indigenous laws.

The very structure of courts and tribunals and their adversarial nature raises concerns of participation by Indigenous Peoples and outcomes330 even when the subject matter is fundamentally important and relevant to Indigenous Peoples themselves. For example, the experience of colonial violence committed by state officials, such as with the Indian Residential Schools, is part of the collective psyche shared by Indigenous Peoples.331 Could Indigenous Peoples reasonably expect to have their grievances related to Residential Schools heard in a process that is culturally-relevant and thereby more meaningful than a structure that further imposes colonial rule?

Such structure concerns were illustrated more broadly in the unfolding of Canada’s Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (“TRC”).332 The TRC process

---

332 The Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), was formed as part of the Indian Residential School Settlement Agreement, which began implementation in September 2009. Under the Settlement Agreement, Canada has certain obligations with respect to the TRC, namely:

- To date, Canada has disclosed over 4.2 million documents to the TRC. As per the Settlement Agreement, Canada is making accessible to the TRC all relevant documents related to Indian residential schools spanning over a century.
- To ensure high level participation at each of the TRC's national events, the Minister of Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada (AANDC) and senior departmental officials participated in each event: Winnipeg, Manitoba in June 2010; Inuvik, Northwest Territories in June 2011; Halifax, Nova Scotia in October 2011; and, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, in June 2012;
was intended to be open and available to Indigenous Peoples. The commission travelled to the places more easily accessed by witnesses, and created a physical circular structure more in keeping with many Indigenous processes than the traditional courtroom setup. As this process was ongoing, the Crown’s simultaneous aggression towards the Complaint was egregious. Canada could have – in the spirit of truth and reconciliation – agreed to resolve the Complaint by providing non-discriminatory levels of funding, or better yet view the Complaint as a chance to address historical wrongs by making room for First Nations children’s access to culturally relevant services.\textsuperscript{333}

The TRC arose out of the Indian Residential School era, as a public acknowledgment of Canada’s legacy of stealing Indigenous children and the continued impacts on the wellbeing of former students, their families and their communities. The TRC seeks truth, like the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, but does so through a structure intended to be more user-friendly, in part by developing procedures less tightly bound up in the ‘truth-seeking’ structure of the colonial state.\textsuperscript{334}

Internationally, Truth and Reconciliation commissions are often found in transitional societies recovering from a national trauma typically brought on by atrocities of civil war, mass violence, dictatorships and/or genocide such as in post-apartheid Republic of South Africa.\textsuperscript{335} Canada’s TRC, like other such commissions, asserts that how Canadians learn about these injustices is as important as learning truths about what happened.\textsuperscript{336}

In \textit{Unsettling the Settler},\textsuperscript{337} Paulette Regan writes that Canada might learn something about using truth and reconciliation commissions through looking at other nations such as South Africa and Peru. For example, insofar as commissions are a structure of western legal regimes and not Indigenous ones, the process will inherently hold western values. That stated, the TRC worked to ensure the hearings were structured around Indigenous understandings of truth-telling. There is a lesson for the Tribunal here in both expanding a mandate to its fullest and working within an existing legal model – such as a truth and reconciliation commission – to find a way out of the status quo and address systemic problems, even with the process itself.

\section*{3.3 Human Rights, Indigenous Rights and Equality: Strategic Choices}

\subsection*{3.3.1 Individuals & the Collective}

The Complaint was brought within Canada’s human rights regime and provides opportunity for the Tribunal to consider Indigenous laws when creating systemic remedies. If the Tribunal wants to narrow the socio-economic gap, it should ensure space for and rely on Indigenous means of protecting children. With this the sphere of universal human rights, emphasis is on the western concept of rule of law and the assertion of equality between individuals\textsuperscript{338} versus the collective rights of Indigenous Peoples,

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{336} P. Regan, \textit{Unsettling the Settler Within: Indian Residential Schools, Truth Telling, and Reconciliation in Canada}, (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2010).
\item \textsuperscript{337} \textit{Ibid}.
\item \textsuperscript{338} D. Ivison, P. Patton and W. Sanders, \textit{Political Theory and the Rights of Indigenous Peoples}, (Cambridge:
\end{itemize}
including their potential right to be governed by Indigenous legal orders. Individual rights hold promise for the individual when used as a political maneuver against state action. In Taking Rights Seriously, Dworkin argues, individuals “have rights when, for some reason, a collective goal is not a sufficient justification for denying them what they wish, as individuals, to have or to do, or not a sufficient justification for imposing some loss or injury.”

Individual rights apply to and are useful for Indigenous people, but must not always subordinate collective rights, in particular the group “right to cultural protection”. The tension between the individual and collective rights of Indigenous Peoples can be seen in the context of Indigenous laws addressing child welfare protection.

3.3.2 Finding Space for Indigenous Laws in Seeking to Remedy Loss

As we shall see, the intergenerational complexities attributed to Indian Residential Schools contribute significantly to the Complaint being about more than just discrimination in funding. The impacts of such a vicious act of taking children damaged families, communities and the entire country. Taking a child is not just about the child. Elder Robert Joseph testified before the Tribunal in the Complaint to explain the 342 Elder Robert Joseph testified on behalf of the Complainants. Elder Joseph is an hereditary Chief of the Gwa wauk First Nation and attended residential school in Alert Bay, off the coast of Vancouver Island. He shares his knowledge and wisdom in the Big House and as a Language Speaker with the University of British Columbia, an internationally recognized art curator and as co-author of “Down from the Shimmering Sky: Masks of the Northwest Coast.” In, he received an Honorary Doctorate of Law Degree from the University of British Columbia for his importance of children and the collective among his people, the Kwakwaka’wakw, by describing the Heiltsu gula – the “Enough Time Has Passed” ceremony.\(^{343}\) When a child is born to the Kwakwaka’wakw, they are thought to be deciding whether to stay in the mortal world or return to the spirit world.\(^{344}\) This hovering takes some time. The Kwakwaka’wakw tempt the newborns to stay by showering them with love.\(^{345}\) Should a child remain after ten months, the Heiltsu gula is performed.\(^{346}\) It is a colossal event at which the entire village and many guests attend to acknowledge the child’s permanence. Held in a Gukwdzi (“Bighouse”), the ceremony illustrates the sacredness of the family’s bond to the child and is a transformative moment in a child’s life. Before witnesses the family affirms they will do all they can to ensure the child will live a good life, be cared for and kept safe.\(^{347}\)

During the Heiltsu gula, women step forward declaring their commitment to mentor the child in the meaning of life among the people, and most importantly show the child what love means.\(^{348}\) The Keepers of the Chants sing, drawing in the people’s ancestors and creating sanctuary in the Gukwdzi.\(^{349}\) A speaker rises conveying of the distinguished achievements in serving BC and Canada. In 2014, he received the Jack P. Blaney Award for Dialogue from Simon Fraser University and an Honorary Doctorate of Divinity from Vancouver School of Theology for his work in reconciliation and renewing relationships between Aboriginal peoples and all Canadians.
http://reconciliationcanada.ca/chief-dr-robert-joseph/

\(^{343}\) Complaint, Elder Joseph Transcripts, page 14-15, Volume 42.
\(^{344}\) I was struck by the similarity of the Heiltsu gula and what I have come to understand through my own teachers, such as Elder Vern Harper, of Cree culture when we wait until a child is around two before they are given their first strawberries. For the Cree this is about the age when enough time has passed and we know a child has chosen to stay among us. Grandparents and parents sit on a blanket with a basket of berries. They call to the child and when the child arrives on the blanket they are hugged and fed berries while their name is whispered to them for the first time; thanks is given and songs are sung to them for choosing to stay. It is understood that the child’s first taste of sweetness will then be associated with their name and family; that the berries connect and bind these elements all together so that throughout the child’s life she or he knows they are loved and cared for. This is conducted in front of witnesses who by attendance show the child they too are here to help. In this way, the Heiltsu gula is representative of the ceremonies held by First Nations throughout Canada that speak to and demonstrate the value placed on children and the importance of the collective roles, rights and responsibilities.

\(^{345}\) Elder Joseph, supra, at note 343, 14.

\(^{346}\) Ibid.

\(^{347}\) Ibid, 14-15.

\(^{348}\) Ibid, 17.

\(^{349}\) Ibid, 17-18.
importance of the gathering. Parents step out from behind a screen (a metaphorical barrier between spirit and mortal worlds), cradling their child and leading extended family into the Gukwdzi. Medicine people follow with an abalone shell containing sacred medicine purifying the Gukwdzi and all those within. A matriarch snips a locket of hair from the child and singes it in the shell with the medicines further signifying the sacredness of children.

Nearing the end of the Heiltsu gula a vase is filled with, kwa-lastra (“life-giving water”), in which women bathe the child. Okra is smudged to on the faces of the child and all those inside the Gukwdzi as an invitation to become part of the child’s life, thereby marking the beginning of the responsibilities of the many helpers, guardians and mentors who have committed to care and provide for the child throughout his or her life. Armlets and wristlets are placed on the child signifying protection from harm. Young men step forward and offer mentorship, committing to remain part of the child’s life forever. Songs are sung. The child and all of the people are bound. The Heiltsu gula is complete. All this care is taken, all of this thoughtfulness considered, all this participation is necessary for the singular purpose of binding the child to family; to people; to place. The Heiltsu gula is reflective of the Kwakwaka’wakw’s beliefs that children are central to the universe.

---

350 Ibid.
351 Ibid.
352 Ibid.
353 Ibid.
354 Ibid, 15.
355 Ibid, 18.
356 Ibid.
357 Ibid, 19.
358 Ibid.
359 Ibid.
360 Ibid.
361 Ibid, 16.
Placing the Heiltsu gula in juxtaposition with the experience of residential schooling, wherein children underwent an immediate, violent and brutal transition from being at the centre of the universe, to non-entities where they no longer carried a name but were assigned numbers.\textsuperscript{362} Children were not valued for who they were, but rather were brutally transformed towards a colonialist end.\textsuperscript{363} First Nation children were stolen and “one of the greatest tragedies…was that the children never experienced love; [it] was simply absent in their lives for a long time.”\textsuperscript{364} The children and grandchildren of Residential School students are now finding their way into foster care in ever increasing numbers. As we have seen with the Indian Act, the policy of removing children to Indian Residential Schools was not the only racist and discriminatory act by Canada against Indigenous Peoples. The Indian Residential Schools policy stole children, broke families; and attacked Indigenous languages, cultures and legal orders that if left undisturbed created binding agreements among families and communities, compacts and lawful relationships.

Elder Joseph’s testimony stands as evidence to what might be restored if the Tribunal’s remedies also seek to address the very system that allowed for the Kwakwaka’wakw’s children, among other Indigenous Peoples’, to be taken in the first instance. On a more systemic level, an order might be considered that provides sustainable funding for Indigenous communities to give effect to child welfare laws such as those found within the Heiltsu gula ceremony. Restoring the health and socio-economic status of communities leads to healthier more functional homes and families. Stronger communities and families mean fewer children in child welfare.

\textsuperscript{362} B. Sellars \textit{They Called Me Number One}, (Vancouver: Talonbooks, 2012).
\textsuperscript{363} \textit{Ibid}, 35.
\textsuperscript{364} \textit{Ibid}, 16.
3.4 What is at Stake in this Complaint?

3.4.1 Addressing Intergenerational Trauma

As set out earlier, the Complaint appears to be a matter of discrimination in relation to the provision of a federal service – the provision of child welfare funding – but it is also about the ugly colonialism in Canada’s past and present. Indian Residential Schools set in motion a cycle of trauma that Indigenous Peoples in Canada continue to experience,\(^{365}\) insofar as it set out to “cut the artery of culture”\(^{366}\) of Indigenous Peoples. Indeed, the legal and archival records demonstrate a traumatic alteration of community and family bonds for Indigenous Peoples.\(^{367}\) Overtime the Schools were highly successful at loosening the bonds between parent and child; extended family; community; people; and place.\(^{368}\) This untying translated into loss of Indigenous languages, teachings and learning of Indigenous legal orders,\(^{369}\) as well as a legacy of alcohol and drug abuse problems, depression, dependency, isolation, suicide, homelessness, sexual abuse and violence.\(^{370}\)

The trauma experienced by First Nation children in the Indian Residential Schools has led to elevated incidents of depression and suicide, which has been transmitted down \(^{365}\) S. Fournier and E. Crey, Stolen From Our Embrace: the Abduction of First Nations Children and the Restoration of Aboriginal Communities (Toronto: Douglas and McIntyre, 1997).

\(^{366}\) Testimony of Dr. John Milloy, Transcript Volume 35 at pp 175-177; see also House of Commons, Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, Evidence, 40th Parl., 3rd Sess., No. 56 (February 8, 2011) at page 2, (Mary Polak, Minister of Children and Family Development, Governments of British Columbia).

\(^{370}\) Ibid, at 1561.
to subsequent generations of Indigenous Peoples who had at least one parent attend an Indian Residential School.\textsuperscript{371} By preventing First Nation children from being raised within families who once made lifelong commitments to a child, such as we have seen in the \textit{Heiltsu gula}, and substituting a foreign institution, former students had limited exposure to parental modeling and when they became parents themselves repeatedly struggled.\textsuperscript{372} Subsequently, unstable households with lower levels of education for both the former students and their children are often the results.\textsuperscript{373} This cycle continues today in that there is a persistent white supremacist presumption that First Nations people are naturally bad parents\textsuperscript{374} – rather than people struggling with Canadian government sponsored infliction of severe pain – leading their children to be taken into foster care.\textsuperscript{375}
The effects of Indian Residential Schools are long-term. Indigenous Peoples “with greater childhood adversity were at greater risk for intimate partner violence, both being a victim and perpetrating intimate partner violence.”\textsuperscript{376} Further, such childhood trauma is also associated with impaired worker performance so that those with higher childhood trauma have more missed days at work and lower performance, which in turn leads to socioeconomic challenges.\textsuperscript{377} In addition to depression, perception of discrimination by former students and their families is a further stressor that can re-traumatize or trigger episodes of violence, depression or encourage substance abuse.\textsuperscript{378} These elements

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{371} A. Bombay, K. Matheson, and H. Anisman, “The Impact of Stressors on Second Generation Indian Residential \textsuperscript{372} P.J. Morrissette [Holocaust], supra, note 368.
\textsuperscript{373} E. Bougie and S. Senecal, “Registered Indian Children's School Success and Intergenerational Effects of Residential \textsuperscript{374} M. Kline, “Complicating the Ideology of Motherhood: Child Welfare Law and First Nation Women,” \textit{Queen's LJ} 18
1986}. Vol. 11. (Winnipeg: University of Manitoba Press) 1999. Dr. Milloy was an expert witn ess in the Complaint, testifying on behalf of the Complainants.
\textsuperscript{375} Bombay, supra, note 371.
\textsuperscript{376} Testimony of Dr. Amy Bombay, Transcript, Volume 40 at pages 103-105.
\textsuperscript{377} \textit{Ibid}, pages 105-107.
\textsuperscript{378} Bombay [2011], supra, note 371, at 370.
\end{flushleft}
collude to a long-term, devastating impact on Indigenous families and communities who suffer from higher levels of mental and physical health complications well into adulthood and transmit the challenges onto the next generation. These same traumas are seen today in First Nation children in care.\textsuperscript{379}

Something has got to give if Canada is going to be a safer place for Indigenous women to live and for children to be raised by their own families – not the state. We know what that legacy looks like. That stated, a considerable dose of skepticism remains on the part of many Indigenous Peoples when it comes to Canada’s ability to pivot on its colonial past and set a course for a more conciliatory future.\textsuperscript{380} Might room be made for Indigenous legal orders in relation to children and family structures? If one of the major contributing factors to large numbers of First Nation children in care relates to Canada’s imposition of its laws without regard for Indigenous legal orders, such as those found within the \textit{Heiltsu gula}, is the Tribunal able to construct remedies that makes room for such laws? Can the Tribunal create systemic remedies that allows for Indigenous Peoples to reestablish their own child welfare services without Canada’s further interventions? Reasonable doubt remains given the ongoing penchant for decision-making within Canada’s legal system that supports the status quo.

\textbf{3.4.2 Precedent Setting}

The Complaint is the first of many waiting to proceed through the system and is “a major test of the extent to which Indigenous Peoples living on reserves can use the \textsuperscript{380} Coulthard, \textit{supra}, note 11.

Canadian Human Rights Act to bring about real, tangible change in their communities”, 381 thereby escalating the significance of the ultimate decision of the Tribunal and the outcome of an inevitable judicial review by the Courts. As discussed, there is a lot at stake and the issues are complicated. The number of complaints is rising and long-outstanding issues – such as underfunded on-reserve education, access to safe drinking water, and a right to housing – all await their turn to be heard. 382 The number of waiting complaints and the continued widening of the socio-economic gap centrally places the Tribunal as an agent of change making its approach to systemic orders all the more considerable.

3.5 Some Conclusions

In this chapter, I have tried to describe the difficulties of bringing a challenge, which at its height, aims at decolonization, through a structure imposed and governed by the rules and traditions of the colonial state. I described the Complaint and the road it travelled from the Tribunal in the first instance to judicial review and appeal, as well as Canada’s retaliatory conduct against Dr. Blackstock for bringing the Complaint. I have highlighted Canada’s vigorous effort to prevent a hearing on the merits and the reversal of the Tribunal’s dismissal by the courts. I have considered the ways in which the Tribunal process itself exists in conflict with many Indigenous traditions with respect to truth telling and adjudication, before turning to concerns about the clash of individually based human rights under the CHRA and the collective rights of Indigenous Peoples, such as those in UNDRIP. Finally, I have attempted to illustrate the reasons that Indigenous

381 Ibid.
382 Annual Reports, supra, note 268.
Peoples should accept the risks and contradictions inherent in the bringing of this complaint, in this venue. I have also set out that room should be made for Indigenous legal orders, which structure the coexistence of collective and individuals differently from the mainstream and includes how child welfare could be reestablished based on the collective responsibilities of a community.

Consider fundamentally that when Indigenous Peoples are able to “gain influence over the central institutions in their communities – the schools, the justice system, the child welfare system – Indian and Métis people have already demonstrated that they can repair the damage caused by centuries of racism and neglect.”383 No system or idea is perfect. But Canada’s continued violence against Indigenous Peoples and their children is the incredibly damaging and colonialism a fundamentally flawed and violent system. Though Indigenous Peoples’ own legal orders may also not be perfect they were created by and for Indigenous Peoples while Canada’s master narrative continues to leave deep scars on Indigenous Peoples.

That Grandfather of Gwayakwaadiziwin can be difficult. Sometimes Gwayakwaadiziwin means good people might feel uncomfortable but discomfort does not make good people bad. Contrarily, it makes good people better. Gwayakwaadiziwin may bring the Tribunal around to constructing meaningful systemic remedies if there are first admissions and acceptance that the Tribunal’s structure is part of a colonialist root that thrives on maintaining the status quo in relation to the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians.

The story of Wesukechak and Sihkooseu instructs us on many elements relating to Gwayakwaadiziwin. Not a single character in the story is honest. Everyone seeks personal enrichment by either keeping secrets or telling them. In the same way Wesukechak tries to win a contest through deception for his own cause, so too does Canada perpetuate a colonial narrative that is simply untrue in order to maintain control of lands and resources. Colonialist assumptions about culture and race allow the country to sustain the great lie that Indigenous Peoples are in need of civilization; thereby justifying continued state-sanctioned removal of children from families and communities, which is then underfunded – just like Indian Residential Schools.

---

Does Spider’s decision to spy for his friend echo the retaliation portion of the complaint brought against Canada for spying on Dr. Blackstock as a means to discredit the complaint itself? Ultimately the retaliation complaint was substantiated and like Spider brought about some trouble for Canada – though the Tribunal sought only to sanction with a penalty of fines not remedies that might address the systemic nature of a structure that allows for such spying in the first instance. But Spider’s espionage also calls into question the use of power and police services that do favours for friends.\textsuperscript{384}

Does not the former Prime Minister’s apology for the era of residential schools (and the school programs themselves); Canada’s refusal to entrench UNDRIP into Canada’s laws; a lack of national outrage at the numbers of murder and missing women; and the country’s ongoing failure to address the gap between the quality of life of Indigenous and non-Indigenous Peoples in Canada all conspire – like Sihkooseu and Spider – to claim a prize unfairly won through trickery and deceit? The apology certainly speaks to the deceit of Canada saying sorry while simultaneously continuing policies that perpetuate harm.

The story also reminds us of the importance of being able to choose for ones’ self. We might then find that Indigenous communities should be left to choose the most effective child welfare services for themselves. Perhaps the Tribunal, like the Chief, will get angry enough to declare all bets are off when it comes to the wholesale of First Nation children. Maybe then the Tribunal will find that current levels of funding for First Nation children in care, along with a lack of accessible culturally-relevant child welfare and family services, is discriminatory. Maybe the Tribunal will see the Complaint is part of a larger narrative meant to maintain the vast socio-economic gap. Perhaps the Tribunal, like the Chief, will be so affronted at the trickery that it too will declare Indigenous Peoples free to choose for themselves how to best care for and protect the community’s own children; how to structure family; how to bind children to family; people; and place.

\textsuperscript{384} See Bill C-51, the so-called \textit{Anti-terrorism Act, 2015}, for another parallel of using friends to spy.

    Enough time has passed.
Coyote & Old Woman of the Sea

In the time when the animals were preparing for the people to come there was an Old Woman who came from the ocean. Her long hair was made of kelp and her face and body shifted and moved as though made from water. Her cloak was made of dead fish and fastened together with crab claws. All of the animals were frightened of her for too many times she had unleashed her cruel streak upon them, taking baby birds who hopped too close to the waves, pulling down little seals into the murky depths, slipping her hair around small fish and squeezing them tight.

One day, Coyote found himself padding along a soft sandy beach and came upon a long line of animals meandering this way and that. He approached his brother, Bear, and asked what was happening. Bear said none of the animals wanted to stand in line but the Old Woman held them in place with her power. Curious, Coyote trotted to the front and watched as the Old Woman tied the animals one by one onto a cradleboard and threw them out into the sea shouting they must go forever. After some time the board would float back with nothing but a few bones on it.

Coyote was horrified. He desperately wanted to run away. But did not want to leave the other animals to their fate and he knew when the people came they would not be able to live long with such a mean being. So he began to pace back and forth, back and forth (as Coyotes often do), while he used one of his gifts from the Creator, imagination. You see, in another time, in an earlier story when Coyote got his name, the Creator gifted Coyote with both imagination and the power to return to life. After pacing for a while, Coyote hatched a plan.

He ran to the head of the line and stood in front of everyone else where he employed another of his skills – bragging. Coyote very loudly told the Old Woman that anyone can go out to sea on a board and return alive. It was easy, he said. He said that if he can do it so could the Old Woman. Well, the Old Woman was very proud and would not be bested by Coyote so she agreed to Coyote’s dare.

The Old Woman strapped Coyote to the board and sent him out. All of the animals in line knew that this was their only chance to live so they raised up their voices together and shouted for Coyote to come back. Then they waited.

They waited some more. There was no sight of Coyote or the board, only foamy waves crashing on the shore.

After more time passed, the animals started to laugh. Coyote had used his power to return to life and came surfing back to shore on the cradleboard. The Old Woman was tied to the board, thrown out to sea and all of the animals shouted for her to never come back and she never did.

Grass Dancers

At a powwow, there are always dancers. Dressed in full regalia and moving in large numbers, it is a spectacular sight that is unparalleled. The order in which

---

386 Vern Harper, Cree Elder as well as John Snake, Rama First Nation member and Culture Coordinator (teacher and friend), have shared with me a number of teachings over the years relating to many subjects, including powwow songs and dancing, which is how I have to come to understand the role of the grass dancer as I have set it out.

387 For a more in-depth discussion on the history and structure of powwows see T. Browner, *Heartbeat of the People:
Music and Dance of the Northern Pow-wow*, University of Illinois Press, 2004; O. T. Hatton, "In the Tradition: Grass
"Performance Practices of Northern Plains Powwow Singing Groups," Anuario Interamericano de Investigacion the various styles of dancers enter the powwow ring is always the same. The men who grass dance come in first. Why? Settlers sometimes perceive this as sexist. This reaction is indicative of cultural arrogance and a continued unwillingness to consider the possibility that Indigenous cultures, laws and practices may actually offer a positive contribution to Canadian society.

Returning to our powwow, closer observation of the movements of grass dancers’ feet reveals they are at once certain and light – like those of a good hunter who is able to move silently. The colourful ribbons and yarn on their regalia is reflective of many kinds of grasses that fill forests, fields and meadows. As the men dance, the regalia moves in a way that mimics blowing grasses. The role of the grass dancer is essential – like that of a worthy diplomat – to coax the grasses into lying down, in order for the people to come together. These dancers are asked move sure footedly but gently so that the grass beneath their feet bends but does not break. In this way, when the powwow is over, when all of the dances have been danced, when the sounds of the drum have faded, when the songs have been sung, when the gathering dwindles and the people leave, the grasses will stretch themselves awake again. Grass dancers are sent in first because they make room for the rest to follow.

Musical (1974), 123-137; M. Matterm, "The Powwow as a Public Arena for Negotiating Unity and Diversity in 388 For more on powwow dancers see, R. DesJarlait, "The Contest Powwow Versus the Traditional Powwow and the Role of the Native American Community," Wicazo Sa Review (1997), 115-127.
389 Browner, supra, note 378.
Like numbers and law, remedies matter.\textsuperscript{390} In this Chapter I argue that when it comes to crafting remedies intended to close the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians the complications multiply. The purpose of remedies in relation to human rights is multifold – punitive, compensatory, deterrent, restorative – and may take both monetary and non-monetary forms.\textsuperscript{391} In this Chapter I will argue that proper and well-considered remedies in the Complaint would embrace both reparation for the alleged discrimination at issue and systemic measures intended to preclude and minimize future discrimination.\textsuperscript{392} I argue here that remedies should include respect for and engagement with Indigenous legal orders, such as those found in the Heitsl gula for example, will not necessarily eliminate all of the problems associated with the current child welfare crisis. They could, however, at least begin to alter the power imbalance that sees Indigenous Peoples’ children taken away from families already broken from the Indian Residential School legacy. This Chapter explores the premise that not only should remedies address the Complaint but also the very system that allowed the Complaint to arise. How might the Human Rights Tribunal make room in the construction of systemic remedies in the Complaint for Indigenous Peoples and their laws?

\textsuperscript{392} Roach and Sharpe, supra, note 390, at 393.
\textsuperscript{393} Ibid.
4.2 Human Rights: A Universal Idea?

4.2.1 Individual vs. Collective forms of Rights

Over the past century or so, the turn to individual rights in Western law has been profound,\(^{394}\) such as the development of a vast body of common law; the Charter of Rights and Freedoms;\(^{395}\) the Canadian Human Rights Act;\(^{396}\) the Employment Equity Act;\(^{397}\) the Canada Labour Code;\(^{398}\) and the like, supporting individual rights with a human rights emphasis.\(^{399}\) The focus on individual rights has gone along with very little attention to Indigenous Peoples, let alone indigenous legal cultures.\(^{400}\) But what happens when individual rights clash with cultures sharing the same space, cultures that may place collective conceptions of rights at the center of their legal orders?

---

\(^{394}\) R. Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1978). Among other things, Dworkin asserts a functionalist account of rights that essentially holds the distinctive element about rights generally is that they function as a trump card when played against collective values, goals and ideals. As such, rights are carried by the individual so as to distinguish them from collective rights as per Y. Dinstein, “Collective Human Rights of Peoples and Minorities,” International and Comparative Law Quarterly, 25(01), (1976) 102-120.

\(^{397}\) Employment Equity Act, S.C 1995, c 44.

\(^{399}\) J. L. Coleman contends in The Practice of Principle, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001), that from a legal positivist’s perspective the only rights that exist are those that are enforceable and exist by virtue of legislation, common law, etc. That stated, there is a spectrum among legal positivists that allows on one end ‘inclusive legal positivists’ for morality to be a condition of legality while on the other end, J. Raz, in Legal Positivism and the Sources of Law, Arguing About Law (2013), 117, posits ‘exclusive legal positivists’ offer no allowance for morality in law. In my view, whether a positivist (exclusive or inclusive, Dworkinian, natural lawyers, etc.), all accept the foundational tenant that law is based on individual rights and argue among themselves as to how such matters should be determined.

4.2.2 Human Rights & Cultural Contentions

In his article, “The Attack on Human Rights”, Ignatieff argues there are three archetypes at issue in the ongoing human rights/cultural contention, namely: Islam, East Asia and the West itself. Ignatieff posits universality of human rights discourse in the West relies on the separation of church and state, which denotes a sovereign, independent individual in opposition to Islam’s structure. The “Asia model” (as Ignatieff refers to it), challenges the idea of universal human rights insofar as the region’s relative economic success allows for the assertion that community and family rank ahead of individual rights, democracy and individual freedoms. Finally, within the West itself, Ignatieff suggests human rights are often seen as a Western construct of limited applicability.

Ignatieff primarily focuses his analysis on states. As such, an Indigenous model is not contemplated. Though the state analysis provides a high level view it forecloses possibilities of Indigenous contributions to human rights discussions insofar as the West too often considers Indigenous Peoples conquered. This may be evidence human rights are “a Western construct of limited applicability” by perpetuating the colonialist master narrative and sets up a framework where Indigenous Peoples engage in human rights discourse against the state and less so within their own nations. This may be why increasingly Indigenous Peoples are embracing a worldwide expansion of a “human rights culture⁴⁰⁷ and are arguing for rights ranging from property rights,⁴⁰⁸ customary land tenure⁴⁰⁹ to water rights⁴¹⁰ with some success while diverting less attention to a human rights discourse within Indigenous cultures – though such undertakings may also be useful to resolving disputes within Indigenous cultures. Might Ignatieff’s non-inclusion of Indigenous Peoples as an influence in human rights be reflective of my earlier concerns that the system itself is not capable of seeing its own role in ongoing colonization and continues to find ways to construct and absence of Indigenous legal orders in spite of evidence Indigenous Peoples globally are entering into the human rights arena?

Ignatieff – working with the views of Adamantia Pollis and Peter Schwab – describes the idea of human rights as a “twentieth-century fiction dependent on the rights traditions of the United States, the United Kingdom and France and therefore inapplicable in cultures that do not share this historical matrix of liberal individualism.”⁴¹¹ This idea finds grounding in the theory of cultural normative relativism⁴¹² most ⁴⁰⁹ Aurelio Cal v. Belize, Supreme Court of Belize (Claims No. 171 and 172, Oct 18, 2007), held in favour of Indigenous property rights based on customary land tenure and cited the UNDRIP.

---

⁴¹¹ Ignatieff, supra, note 401, 104.
⁴¹² In relation to human rights, cultural normative relativism theory essentially holds that not all human rights are culturally relevant (widely-accepted), or cross-culturally based as set out above in Ignatieff’s tri-model example. For more see: S. Lawson, "Democracy and the Problem of Cultural Relativism: Normative Issues for International Politics," Global Society: Journal of Interdisciplinary International Relations 12.2 (1998), 251-270; C.M. Cerna, "Universality of Human Rights and Cultural Diversity: Implementation of Human Rights in Different Socio-cultural Contexts," Human Rights Quarterly (1994), 740-752. There is also some scholarship offering nuance to the wording "universal human rights" that seems to be the pivot point for critique of the universality of human right by setting out a distinction between substantive human rights – namely those rights held by all humans, such as a right to be born free – and conceptual human rights – such as a right to religious freedom – which may allow room for cultural differences. For more see: J Donnelly, "The Relative Universality of Human Rights," Human Rights Quarterly 29.2 (2007), 281-306.
versions of which become “practically unintelligible to Western philosophers,” as they suggest:

What is right or good for one individual or society is not right or good for another, even if the situations involved are similar, meaning not merely that what is thought right or good by one is not thought right or good by another (this is just descriptive relativism over again), but what is really right or good in the one case is no so in another.

This is because “Western philosophers presume that the concept of morality makes no sense unless it is universally applicable.” Such a presumption only assists in validating the position of critics that human rights is the West’s modern-day exercise of its imperial past and ongoing insatiable quest for dominance, power and control of the entire world. In his analysis of the internal challenges to the notion of global human rights Ignatieff concludes that with a pluralistic world, changes are coming to human rights and that the main contribution human rights may make to historical human development is relegating the hierarchical ordering of civilizations and cultures into the past.

If Ignatieff is correct about the coming change, if Western law and philosophy is open to the richness and deeper nuance in the theory of cultural normative relativism perhaps we will be able to find our way to meaningful access to human rights and remedies for Indigenous Peoples. The coming ‘leveling out of cultures’ must include the Western mainstream recognizing its own status as a culture amongst others. This would also entail Canada’s recognition of the way white supremacy has influenced Canada’s responses to Indigenous Peoples, including the taking of Indigenous children into

---

415 Renteln, supra, note 413, at 72.
416 Ignatieff, supra, note 401, 105.
Residential Schools and now child welfare. Perhaps these changes Ignatieff forecasts will make room in human rights discourse for the inclusion of other legal orders, such as those of Indigenous Peoples, and openly recognize that in Canada’s situation (at least) the human rights regime continues to draw benefit from ongoing colonialism.

Operationally, this may look something like the powwow dance rings, in which the grass dancers are sent in first to coax the grasses into bending but not breaking. Relinquishing the premise that human rights are universal, allows room for other cultural values to enter the ring and produce something new, something neither entirely Western nor Islamic nor Asian nor Indigenous but something intersocietal.418 Alternatively, failing to release a tight grip on the idea of universal human rights will continue to provide nourishment to critics who see human rights as the West’s advancement of imperialism.

4.3 Human Rights & Indigenous Legal Orders

4.3.1 Value of Indigenous Laws in Systemic Remedies

All victims of gross violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms should be entitled to restitution, a fair and just compensation and the means for as full a rehabilitation as possible for any damage suffered by such victims, either individually or collectively.419

Indigenous legal orders are too often neither understood nor included within the human rights sphere. Systemic remedies in the Complaint should address the systemic issues, such as the ongoing benefits derived by Canada through maintenance of the status quo, which denies room for Indigenous legal orders. To be effective systemic remedies should create space for the development and sustainable funding of culturally relevant and accessible child welfare services and cultural relevance is sourced in Indigenous laws. In Canadian law, it is a fundamental tenet that there cannot be a right without an adequate remedy.\textsuperscript{420} Recognizing and including Indigenous legal orders is both symbolic and of practical importance with respect to a more inclusive master narrative and a human rights regime that is reflective of Indigenous and non-Indigenous people. Without this inclusion, there is a practical failure of justice. Eliminating the socioeconomic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous people in Canada is not possible without including and relying upon Indigenous law – particularly as a means of crafting sufficient remedies. Part of the balance to be struck when constructing remedies is between seeking what is possible – or a well-worn path, such as on-line training modules for findings of workplace harassment – and crafting ambitious and pragmatic remedies.\textsuperscript{421} Moving to the latter will be a significant challenge to the decision makers.\textsuperscript{422}

The Complaint offers significant opportunity to effect change by drawing on Indigenous laws. The Tribunal’s enabling legislation creates a broad latitude to “make an order against the person found to be engaging or to have engaged in the discriminatory practice and include in the order”\textsuperscript{423} a number of possible remedies as discussed further below.\textsuperscript{424} While the complaint uses a funding disparity to empirically illustrate the \textsuperscript{420} Roach, \textit{supra}, note 390, at 396.

\textsuperscript{422} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{423} \textit{CHRA}, s.53(2).
\textsuperscript{424} Section 53 of \textit{CHRA} sets out the Tribunal’s general remedial powers:

(2) If at the conclusion of the inquiry the member or panel finds that the complaint is substantiated, the member or panel may, subject to section 54 make an order against the person found to be engaging or to have discrimination, the complainants are not singularly concerned with funding. They present a variety of arguments about systemic discrimination. The Complaint seeks to establish systemic discrimination and thereby call upon the Tribunal to craft systemic remedies.

4.3.2. The Call for Culturally-Relevant Child Welfare

On the assumption the Tribunal finds substantiation of the Complaint (assumed throughout this Chapter), remedies must take on the context of settler-colonialism - not merely rename it racism, or revert to blaming individual bad actors. Remedies should not seek a more efficient administration of colonialism – as happened in the aftermath of the Stonechild murder. Instead, systemic remedies should focus on ameliorating the lack of a culturally relevant First Nation child welfare system. This will require making room for engaged in the discriminatory practice and include in the order any of the following terms that the member or panel considers appropriate:

(a) that the person cease the discriminatory practice and take measures, in consultation with the Commission on the general purposes of the measures, to redress the practice or to prevent the same or a similar practice from occurring in future, including
   (i) the adoption of a special program, plan or arrangement referred to in subsection 16(1), or
   (ii) making an application for approval and implementing a plan under section 17;

(b) that the person make available to the victim of the discriminatory practice, on the first reasonable occasion, the rights, opportunities or privileges that are being or were denied the victim as a result of the practice;

(c) that the person compensate the victim for any or all of the wages that the victim was deprived of and for any expenses incurred by the victim as a result of the discriminatory practice;

(d) that the person compensate the victim for any or all additional costs of obtaining alternative goods, services, facilities or accommodation and for any expenses incurred by the victim as a result of the discriminatory practice; and

(e) that the person compensate the victim, by an amount not exceeding twenty thousand dollars, for any pain and suffering that the victim experienced as a result of the discriminatory practice.

(3) In addition to any order under subsection (2), the member or panel may order the person to pay such compensation not exceeding twenty thousand dollars to the victim as the member or panel may determine if the member or panel finds that the person is engaging or has engaged in the discriminatory practice willfully or recklessly.

(4) Subject to the rules made under section 48.9, an order to pay compensation under this section may include an award of interest at a rate and for a period that the member or panel considers appropriate.

Section 54

No order that is made under subsection 53(2) may contain a term

(a) requiring the removal of an individual from a position if that individual accepted employment in that position in good faith; or

(b) requiring the expulsion of an occupant from any premises or accommodation, if that occupant obtained those premises or accommodation in good faith.

425 Closing Submissions, Assembly of First Nations, paras. 510-513.
Indigenous legal orders. It will also require creating access to and sustainability of funding for culturally relevant child welfare services. Culturally relevant child welfare services would actively take on the ongoing colonialism by creating space for Indigenous legal orders that have been denied.

4.4 Systemic Remedies for Systemic Problems

4.4.1 Considering Proactive Systemic Remedies

Systemic means “practices or attitudes that have, whether by design or impact, the effect of limiting an individual’s or a group’s right to the opportunities generally available because of attributed rather than actual characteristics.”426 The fact that effective remedies for systemic human rights violations will differ from traditional common law approaches to remedy has been recognized for decades in Canadian jurisprudence. In a complaint brought by Action Travail des femmes (Action Travail) 1987, the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal ruled Canadian National Railway Co. (CNR),427 had discriminated against women in its hiring practices for certain types of front line railway positions (so-called ‘blue-collar’ jobs), otherwise thought to be the work of men. As part of a comprehensive remedial order, the Tribunal required at least one-in-four new employees hired by CNR for ‘blue-collar’ positions be filled by a woman until the overall employment rate at CNR reached thirteen percent – the national percentage at the time of women working in equivalent jobs elsewhere. The Supreme Court of Canada unanimously upheld the Tribunal’s decision and therein its jurisdiction for ordering such remedies and reinstated the Tribunal’s original order.

427 Ibid at 1138.
As the Action Travail decision was making its way to the Supreme Court of Canada (and after the decision was released), the public debate largely focused on the desirability of various elements of affirmative action initiatives. The Court confirmed the Tribunal’s remedial power to counter sexual discrimination by creating required standards based on comparative data (i.e. general employment rates for women working in blue-collar jobs). In the context of the Complaint, these proactive and systemic remedial powers offers the Tribunal a chance to initiate an effort to close the vast socio-economic gap.

4.4.2 Credible First Starts in Crafting Systemic Remedies

Canada has more than exceeded the Court’s definition of ‘systemic’ when it comes to discrimination against Indigenous Peoples. The crafting of systemic remedies in response to the Complaint will also not be so comprehensive as to resolve all of the ongoing impacts of colonization but rather should lay the foundation for a good start. Considerations relating to the crafting of systemic remedies in the Complaint matters because – as I have noted earlier – there is a growing number of human rights complaints relating Indigenous Peoples, and remedies offered to this Complaint might be viewed like the TRC’s Calls to Action. This is to say the systemic remedies arising from the Complaint may serve as a blueprint for approaching the myriad other complaints entangled in ongoing colonization. In contrast, a failure to offer effective, systemic remedies will only further risk diminishing the legitimacy of the Tribunal in the eyes of Indigenous Peoples, and would risk illustrating that the Tribunal is simply another organ of the colonial and oppressive state. Immediately requiring changes in the level of funding is one thing. Creating culturally appropriate child welfare, however, is another.

---

4.4.3 Partners in Solutions: Remedies & Process

Such a huge remedial task would have to start with a process in which Indigenous organizations and governments will be involved. The Tribunal may also draw upon the systemic remedies in Hughes.\textsuperscript{429} James Hughes requires the use of a wheelchair. His assigned polling station in a 2008 federal by-election was not accessible. The Tribunal found discrimination, and ordered individual damages but importantly, also found that Elections Canada had engaged in systemic discrimination against Canadians with disabilities. As a result, the Tribunal ordered direct consultation between persons with disabilities and Elections Canada.\textsuperscript{430} Hughes supports the premise that in recognition of systemic discrimination, remedies must include the direct involvement of the group discriminated against. Here the Tribunal’s remedial order on consultation allowed the government to understand what they had done, what they missed and that the group involved were experts who were part of the solution, not the problem.

4.4.4 Consultation and Process as Elements of Effective Systemic Remedies

A process to really address systemic discrimination against Indigenous Peoples is a collective one and should include federal government representatives, the provinces and a wide-ranging representation of Indigenous Peoples. Here, in some ways, the Kelowna Accord is instructive though not new in its call for the inclusion of Indigenous Peoples in the resolution of complicated problems. With respect to socio-economic issues, such as First Nation child welfare, Indigenous Peoples are part of the solution, not the problem. Indeed, in her 1984 Royal Commission Report, Report of the Commission on Equality and Employment, Justice Abella stated:

\textsuperscript{429} Hughes v. Elections Canada, 2010 CHRT 4.
\textsuperscript{430} Ibid, at paras. 79-80.

The central issues for native people are their exclusion from relevant decision-making, the fragmented and uncoordinated programming, the problem of uncoordinated policy approaches, the absence of federal/provincial/municipal coordination of service delivery systems, and the constant sense that they are forever subject to the discretion of people who do not understand their culture.

Justice Abella highlights the typical relationship between Canada and Indigenous peoples, one in which the federal government tells First Nation governments what to do. In contrast, the approach adopted in the Kelowna Accord was different. A round-table process was created to promote dialogue and allow direct Canada-Indigenous engagement. It involved 147 representatives at the round-tables, federal government, ten representatives from the provinces and the remaining participants were Indigenous, representing twenty-seven different Indigenous organizations Overall, in the more global Roundtable-to-Kelowna process, there were over a thousand participants. The vast majority were Indigenous but the group also included provincial Premiers and the then Prime Minister Paul Martin.

The Tribunal cannot compel the Prime Minister let alone the Premiers to a table to solve the First Nations child welfare crisis. But if the Tribunal is as courageous as it once was when it compelled CNR to hire more women to numbers established by the Tribunal, creating a process by which systemic discrimination against Indigenous Peoples and setting practical expectations is not outside the Tribunal’s purview. The elements of Kelowna are what matters here – such as direct engagement with Indigenous Peoples, and engagement of the political will of the Crown, full participation of all key stake-holders and senior decision-makers with authority to make commitments. These could be replicated by the Tribunal vis-à-vis a systemic order. This model of direct engagement is the most effective way by which the socio-economic gap might be closed because it draws upon First Nation solutions with Canada’s support – financial and political.

---

434 Ibid, at 2-5.

The Tribunal can start by ordering Canada to work with First Nations, including Indigenous child welfare agencies across the country, in open roundtable dialogues. To that end, like the Kelowna Accord, a roundtable allows for Indigenous representatives to “sit down on the same side of the table, as partners.”435 As partners, here is another place where room can be made for Indigenous legal orders relating to children and family. Not only does such a process hold potential for sustainable resolution to the First Nation child welfare crisis at the centre of the Complaint but also holds promise for systemic resolution by fundamentally altering the status quo and working toward reconciliation, founded on the principle of equality and mutual respect.436 Indeed, such an Order would be consistent with the Crown’s constitutional duty to meaningfully consult and accommodate Indigenous Peoples,437 which is also included in all stages of high-level decision-making438 – such as at a round-table series with the appropriate representatives of Canada with the power to enter into agreements on First Nation child welfare and 437 Beckman v. Little Salmon Carmacks First Nation, [2010], SCR 103.

438 Rio Tinto Alcan Inc. v. Carrier Sekani Tribal Council, [2010], SCR 650.
make change. Consultation has constitutional value for both Canada and Indigenous parties as already set out by the Court. These precedents should offer the Tribunal some comfort with respect to the inclusion of consultation as part of a systemic remedial order.

Right now, it seems like in the story of Coyote and the Old Woman of the Sea, Indigenous families are standing in a long meandering line and one by one they are being strapped onto a board and thrown away. A well-structured systemic remedy meant to address the gap is a strong step toward destroying the colonialist pattern of Canada knowing what is best for First Nation children. Now is the time for the Tribunal to be brave.

4.4.5 Individual versus Systemic Remedies

It is of course possible that the Tribunal will be tempted to offer individual and not systemic remedies. I argue below that Moore[^439] where a claim was filed by a parent of an individual child seeking both individual and systemic remedies, can be distinguished from the circumstances of the complaint in at least three ways.

Jeffrey Moore had a number of complicated and severe learning disabilities that required intense remediation. He was originally being educated in public school, where his learning needs were met. When funding cuts meant these services could not be provided, Moore was advised to attend private school. He did. At this point, however, Moore’s father filed a human rights complaint on Moore’s behalf alleging discrimination based on his disabilities with respect to services otherwise available to the public. The British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal found both individual and systemic discrimination against students with severe learning disabilities. After wending its way through the court system, the case was resolved when the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously found the public school system discriminated against Moore.

The Court reaffirmed that access to services must be meaningful.\(^{440}\) In Moore, that access was to education generally, not access to special needs services specifically.\(^{441}\)

In her reasons in Moore, Abella J. stated:

\[ \text{the remedy must flow from the claim. In this case, the claim was made on behalf of Jeffrey, and the evidence giving concrete support to the claim all centred on him. While the Tribunal was certainly entitled to consider systemic evidence in order to determine whether Jeffrey had suffered discrimination, it was unnecessary for it to hold an extensive inquiry into the precise format of the provincial funding mechanism or the entire provincial administration of special education in order to determine whether Jeffrey was discriminated against. The Tribunal, with great respect, is an adjudicator of the particular claim that is before it, not a Royal Commission.} \]

In other words, though the Court found discrimination, it was individual not systemic, as the Tribunal initially found. In relation to the Complaint, discrimination is about access to child welfare generally. Moreover, to be meaningful in the wider context of the Complaint, which references the cultural destruction caused by Canada stealing children, it must be about access to culturally relevant child welfare.

The Caring Society’s Complaint is also seeking a finding of systemic discrimination. Does Moore suggest a similar “direct” or “individual” approach to the discrimination in the Complaint? Does Moore support only a narrow finding of discrimination, and therefore a narrow scope of remedies? Is what I have been arguing for in terms of remedies precisely what Justice Abella suggests would be the role of a Royal Commission, not a Human Rights Tribunal? The answer to these questions is no.

\(^{441}\) Moore, supra, note 439, paras. 28-30.
There is considerable evidence before the Tribunal in relation to the system-wide discrimination faced by First Nation children in care. Second, the Complaint is filed by the Caring Society on behalf of all First Nation children, compared to Moore, in which the complaint was filed by Jeffrey’s father on his son’s behalf. Third, though the Tribunal itself is not a Royal Commission, it may rely on the work of previous Royal Commissions in designing remedies. The Final Report of the Royal on Aboriginal People (RCAP) provides the very type of evidence referred to in Moore. In order to not offend Moore, the Tribunal must find systemic discrimination on the evidence placed before it by the parties. Further, it must focus on the issues as raised by the Complaint – namely systemic discrimination based on a long history of First Nation children on-reserves in care, which is how the Complaint has been structured. These elements considerably distinguish the Caring Society complaint from Moore.

In the same way that Coyote wanted to run from the terrifying situation he found himself in, he knew he could not leave the others there to suffer a horrible fate. The situation impacted everyone. The Old Woman of the Sea abused her power to the point of causing the fatal end of others. So, Coyote used his imagination to create a plan, one that overcame not only his own fear but brought the reign of widespread fear to an end. With such broad remedial powers, the Tribunal then, might use its imagination in creating remedies that brings the gap to an end and addresses the whole of the Caring Society’s complaint.

4.5 Supervisory Orders for Recalcitrant Governments

The resolution of this Complaint is ripe for a supervisory order by which the Tribunal might remain seized of the matter to monitor Canada’s good faith in working toward the closure of the socio-economic gap – at least insofar as it relates to First Nation child welfare. For twenty years and counting, Doucet-Boudreau remains the leading decision in Canada with respect to supervisory orders and has been the subject of considerable controversy among legal scholars. Here the trial judge retained jurisdiction when he ordered the government of Nova Scotia to comply with the Charter and meet the deadlines to provide French language schools, which it had consistently failed to do. In particular, the trial judge required Nova Scotia to attend a series of hearings and report to the Court on its progress.

Ultimately, such systemic orders are useful when a party has “proven themselves unworthy of trust.” Similarly, regarding Crown conduct less than trustworthy in relation to Indigenous Peoples, the Supreme Court has stated on occasion, as recently as Manitoba Métis Federation, that honour of the Crown should be at the heart of its relationship with Indigenous Peoples. In Doucet-Boudreau, it was of particular importance that delay with respect to the provision of French language education, the French language and therefore the right to the French language in education and other

---

445 In both Manitoba Metis Federation Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 SCC 14, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 623 and Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010, among other cases the Supreme Court of Canada has set out the significant importance of honour of the Crown. Yet, Canada has the most to gain by ignoring honour and maintaining status quo.
services, was at considerable risk of extinguishment within the region. This is paralleled in the Complaint; without proper funding for culturally appropriate First Nation child welfare services, First Nation culture, laws and families are at risk of extinguishment. Moreover, through an earlier examination of colonialism, Canada, if left to its own devices, may lean toward maintaining the status quo versus proactively working to close the socio-economic gap. The facts of the Complaint demonstrate the difference in funding for child welfare services of First Nation children living on-reserves versus all other Canadian children has been ongoing for decades.\textsuperscript{446} Specifically, the Complainants argue: Canada’s own reports that set out a funding model policy and then unilaterally freeze the rates upon signing of agreements results in continued discrimination and inequitable treatment of First Nations children.\textsuperscript{447}

The Final Report and Calls to Action of Canada’s Truth and Reconciliation Commission, the Final Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples and the now decade old Kelowna Accord all detailed these problems. Canada is aware of these problems.\textsuperscript{448} At the heart of the supervision should be an ongoing examination to ensure that any financial remedy is not just immediate but ongoing, and to ensure that there is an investment in a culturally appropriate Indigenous child welfare system. Though the \textit{CHRA} allows for most follow-up matters to be overseen by the Commission, such an order would not exclude the Commission’s role in implementation of the Tribunal’s remedial orders. In other words, the Commission might be required to work with the parties, consult with First Nation child welfare agencies nationally, meet with First

\textsuperscript{446} Closing Submissions, Assembly of First Nations
\textsuperscript{447} \textit{Ibid.}
\textsuperscript{448} In addition to the evidence listed, at the Assembly of First Nations’ Annual Assembly in Montreal, July 2015, the National Chief stated that between 1981 and 2011 there was no difference – no progress made – in the gap between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal Canadians. The length of time demonstrates the gap is not just a government of the day issue but a Canadian issue.
Nation Elders, such as Elder Joseph, and collate First Nation-based practices and laws relating to children and report back to the Tribunal, if so directed. Remaining seized of the matter may improve conduct on the part of the Crown in the resolution of this case. It may also prompt the Crown to consider how to effectively resolve hundreds of similar complaints already in the system.

Supervisory orders, however, are not without controversy.\(^\text{449}\) This is of particular concern in relation to Charter rights,\(^\text{450}\) such as discrimination – systemic or otherwise – because though the Tribunal is mandated to address discrimination the discomfort of some is it might overreach and adopt an interpretation that is counter-majoritarian in nature.\(^\text{451}\) But remedies devised by the Tribunal could respect the choice of provision of services by Canada to First Nations. Supervisory remedies do not have to be either intrusive on the executive or straining.\(^\text{452}\) Rather, such a remedy must be crafted as a means to leave the “detailed choices of means largely to the executive,”\(^\text{453}\) provided those means are consistent with the law of non-discrimination.

Further, by retaining jurisdiction, the Tribunal will both recognize the significant time frame that will be required to effectively meet the remedial order, and will ideally prevent further costs and delay that would arise should the parties seek further legal redress through applications, motions and other procedural mechanisms.\textsuperscript{454} Canada’s strategy in the Complaint has been to use procedure to delay and even strike the entire matter. This is not a party whose conduct gives rise to an assumption of willing compliance.\textsuperscript{455} Moreover, there are considerable risks that the gap will continue and maybe grow, should the Tribunal fail to remain seized of the complaint.\textsuperscript{456} A supervisory order is a strong signal that the Tribunal will supervise “the reconstruction of the social institution in order to bring it into conformity” with the law.\textsuperscript{457}

\(^{453}\) Ibid.

Carefully considering the terms of a supervisory remedy may also be helpful as a means to address the colonial underpinnings complicating the very structure of the Tribunal, which was created without the input of Indigenous Peoples who now seek redress before it. The supervisory order, may for example, require Elders or other community members to be part of an oversight committee, like the Heitsl gula model, asked to bear witness from the outset. The Order might also require ongoing reporting take place in First Nation communities across Canada as a means to remind all present what they are working toward. In other words, a well-structured supervisory order might find room to include and foster Indigenous legal orders and processes.

\textsuperscript{454} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{455} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{456} K. Roach and G. Budlender. "Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdiction: When is it Appropriate, Just and Equitable?" \textit{South African Law Journal} 122.2 (2005): p-325; see also Little Sisters, supra, at note 60. Roach, supra, at note  [Constitutional Remedies]. In the supplementary judgment of References re: Language under the Manitoba Act, 1870, [1985] 2 SCR, 357, 26 DLR (4th) 767, the court retained jurisdiction to allow for compliance of the parties and to elaborate on its original judgment. Contrarily, in \textit{R. v. Askov} [1990] 3 SCR, 1199, 59 CCC 93d) 449, the court did not retain jurisdiction and was unable to reconsider the implications of its decision regarding a speedy trial being unheeded until over a year and a half later in \textit{R. v. Morin}, [1992] 1 SCR 771, 71 CCC (3d) 1.
\textsuperscript{457} O. Fiss, \textit{The Civil Rights Injunction} (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1978), at 69.
4.6 Some Conclusions

As noted throughout this thesis there is a general level of well-earned mistrust by Indigenous Peoples in relation to legal forums, such as the Tribunal, yet still there is opportunity. Though there is a wariness since the 2007 adoption of UNDRIP at the United Nations, there is some evidence of resistance to the status quo as measured by the increasing level of activity in various human rights forums worldwide by Indigenous Peoples. There is growing engagement in the global human rights movement creating a jurisgenerative moment that is shaping what human rights may mean, perhaps beyond the scope of Ignatieff’s trinity of ideology.

In this chapter, I have argued that the principles of human rights are not settled. As such, room should be made to ensure the inclusion of Indigenous legal orders in the expansion of human rights. The theory of cultural normative relativism offers some support in this regard, so long as Canada approaches inclusion with an open mind. The issues raised in the Complaint are complicated and require considerable effort on the part of the Tribunal with respect to remedies that address both the discrimination in funding but also the importance of systemic remedies aimed at narrowing the socio-economic gap. To that end, the Tribunal should immediately order parity with respect to funding, and order the (monitored) creation of culturally relevant First Nation child welfare that is within the control of Indigenous Peoples.

Indigenous Peoples’ access to human rights, internationally has a “generative force and potential to loosen colonization’s bind” Within three years of UNDRIP’s adoption at the General Assembly, the four dissenting nations – including 459 Stacey, supra, note 407.

---

Canada – had changed their position and adopted the Declaration, though for Canada it remains aspirational. This shift is considerable insofar as the decisions resulting from Indigenous Peoples’ access to domestic human rights regimes have begun to shape the international human rights law as well.\footnote{J. Anaya, “Indian Givers: What Indigenous Peoples Have Contributed to International Human Rights Law,” 22 Wash. U. L.J. & Policy 107 (2006), 108. For more on Indigenous Peoples’ contributions to international law generally see also: L. Benton, \textit{Law and Colonial Cultures: Legal Regimes in World History, 1400-1900} (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); J. Anaya, \textit{Indigenous Peoples in International Law}, (New York: Oxford University Press, 2004), 15-72.} In other words, there is momentum for the Tribunal to pick-up on and create remedies that fundamentally transform the relationship between Canada and Indigenous Peoples by closing the gap – and it starts with the return of First Nations children to the jurisdiction of First Nations people. On the other hand the Tribunal must supervise the Commission’s direct engagement with First Nations to craft sustainable solutions with respect to First Nations child welfare or run the risk of making no difference at all.\footnote{L. A. Miranda, “Indigenous Peoples as International Lawmakers,” 21 U. PA. J. Int’l. L, (2010), at 204 where it states “While indigenous peoples’ participation may serve to lend greater legitimacy to international human rights law and lawmaking processes, such participation may not effectively deliver material gains”; see also, D. Champagne, “Can UNDRIP Be Enforced?” Indian Country (Mar. 5, 2012).} Such Kelowna-style discussions, as suggested above, must have clear objectives and the Tribunal must be prepared to supervise the process if there is to be any constraining of Canada’s clear habit of acting only in its own interests\footnote{J.L. Goldsmith and E.A. Posner, \textit{The Limits of International Law}, Vol. 199 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005).} and any enforcement of real change.\footnote{J. Anaya, \textit{Indigenous Peoples in International Law}, (New York: Oxford University Press, 2004), at 105-131 wherein the author provides an overview of implementation and enforcement mechanisms.} The story of the \textit{Old Woman of the Sea and Coyote}, reminds us to be brave, like Coyote, and not to get in line just because someone who may be more powerful and frightening demands it.

Like Coyote, we too have been gifted with imagination. When confronted with the cruelty of colonization, discriminatory conduct on those who claim power and the like, we must take time to get things right. There is a lot at stake. Individuals. Collectives. Cultures. Societies. Legal Orders. Families. Humans.

Like the line up of animals in the Old Woman of the Sea and Coyote, there is a long, twisting line of theories and views in relation to what human rights entails. Whether a legal positivist – regardless of where you may place yourself on the spectrum – a philosopher, theorist, natural law practitioner, adjudicator or the like, the debate between universalism and relativism can be distracting. The Old Woman of the Sea reminds us not to be arrogant with our theories, philosophies and conduct. There cannot be de facto universalism in relation to human rights unless everyone agrees. As evidenced by the debate itself, everyone does not agree human rights values, as currently constructed, are universal. The difference is cultural. Therefore, unless room is made to allow for other cultural perspectives and other legal orders – such as those of Indigenous Peoples – to reshape the engagement of humans with human rights, there will continue to be disharmony as to how we decide the ways in which we will treat each other and the ways we expect all humans to be treated. Until then, culture after culture will be strapped to a cradleboard and tossed out to sea only and return with only indistinguishable bones. The inclusion and sphere of influence Indigenous legal orders might contribute to the evolution of human rights must be meaningful, deep and entrenched.

Perhaps here, like the animals – who knew their chance when they saw it all called out together for Coyote to come back – we all need to come together and find a way. Grass dancers are instructive too. Do they not remind us by their movements that we should move softly but sure-footedly and make room for the others to join in the circle and dance? What might that look like in relation to closing the socio-economic gap? Though some remedial considerations are expressed above, are we not also only limited by our legal imagination? This is what Aakode’ewin looks like.

CHAPTER 5 –
NIBWAAKAAWIN (WISDOM) & DABAADENDIZIWIN (HUMILITY):
CONCLUSIONS

Fire & Hummingbird

Once, before the people came, there was a great green forest with many well-worn paths from the animals visiting each other every day. In a barren land far away where nothing grew, there lived a tiny spark. He was glum and lonely. One day, little Spark convinced South Wind to carry him away to the north where he could make friends. Feeling sorry for Spark, South Wind blew the little one to the great forest and left him resting on a leaf. Spark nestled in and ate the leaf. It felt good because while he ate, Spark changed. He became a flame. He was bigger, stronger and more powerful now but the forest was still so vast and he was so small. That will change soon, he thought. He jumped to the next leaf and the next – growing larger each time he ate. The transformation and power felt so good that Spark forgot all about being lonely and wanting to make friends. Being a flame was not enough either. He craved more. Soon, he grew so big he became Fire and consumed the whole tree, then the next and the next until the entire forest was alight.

The forest-dwellers ran for their lives. The crawlers, the diggers, the fliers and the runners all made their way to the sandy shores of the great lake. There they stood in silence, watching as Fire consumed their home and destroyed all the paths that they travelled to visit with each other.

After some time passed a few of the animals suggested they leave this place to Fire and journey around the lake to build a new home on the other side. Others thought they should just sit and wait for Fire to leave so they could rebuild all that they once knew. Sides were taken. Division grew. Soon an argument broke out and the animals – who were once family – began yelling at each other while Fire feasted on their home. As they all drew in a breath to unleash more harsh words there was a moment of silence. And in that pause, they heard a sound overhead.

It was a hum. It was the kind of hum that tickles ears and brings smiles of wonder to faces.

The animals forgot their argument. They stared in amazement at their small friend, hummingbird. She hummed as she flew over their heads, dipped her beak into the lake, flew toward the forest and sprayed droplets of water on Fire. She did not pay any mind to the animals’ argument. She did not heed their division. She did not abide by their worry. She was too busy for such distractions.

Hummingbird was no match for all-powerful Fire yet he grew annoyed with the tiny bird. To frighten her, Fire formed a giant face and as hummingbird approached he swelled up to his biggest self and shouted at her “Little hummingbird! What are you doing?”

Hummingbird hovered in the air as only she can – it is one of her gifts. She looked Fire in the eyes. As though generously providing Fire a moment to come to the answer on his own, she threw her wings back, puffed up her chest, lifted her chin and floated held the silence before answering.

I am doing everything that I can.
5.1 Some Final Reflections

As Aboriginal people we understand what would change our destiny but only through a convergence of our own self-determination and a willingness of Canada to decolonize can real change take place. This is not a partisan or ideological issue. Canadians must be prepared to return original jurisdiction to the Indigenous nations whose homelands the state of Canada rests within. Canadians and Indigenous nations need to negotiate real partnerships of mutual respect and benefit or face a certain future of mutual misery and conflict.465

– Robert Lovelace, 2011

Decisions matter.466 I begin and end with the story of Fire & Hummingbird as a feint, a sleight of hand. Its few short paragraphs contain an answer to the question I have posed in my thesis regarding how we might close the socio-economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous people living in Canada, because within this particular story lay all of the Seven Grandfather teachings. Though I have carried this story for many years now, I did not see the answer to my question until almost the very end of my writing. Indeed, this story was the last one to find its way into my thesis. Perhaps another lesson for me in wisdom? Recall that “Ojibway tradition tells us that there were Seven Grandfathers who were given the responsibility by the Creator to watch over the Earth’s people. They were powerful spirits ...Nibwaakaawin ...Zaagi'idiwin ...Minaadendamowin ...Aakode'ewin...Dabaadendiziwin ... Debwewin.”467 These seven watchers show us how to conduct ourselves if we really want change.

The socio-economic gap is so vast it can feel as overwhelming as Fire. Fire can also feel as powerful and insatiable as colonialism, which is nowhere more evident than in Canada’s response to the Complaint specifically and its conduct in response to colonialism generally. Specifically, Canada has taken a consistent position of denial in relation to the Complaint and action to prevent the matter being heard on its merits – even trying to replace the Chair.

---

467 Benton-Benai, supra, note 3.

More generally, Canada’s steadfast refusal to enact UNDRIP domestically, while proclaiming publicly at international forums, such as G20, that Canada has no history of colonialism is disturbing. Canada does have a history and a present of colonialism. It is violent and ugly and our leaders lie about it. Violence is violence whether it is administered in a singular, sweeping action that is over quickly, such as a shooting, or gradually, slowly, over a long period of time. As we have seen in earlier chapters, relating to power and authority such as the police and the Starlight Tours, the “problem is not simply overworked and overstressed police officers; the problem is racist police officers and a system that allows ignorance to flourish.”\textsuperscript{468} The problem is not only legal discourse, the courts, tribunals or the actors within it but the colonialism of the master narrative that is allowed to thrive through national, collective consent that continues unabated, unchanging. So, perhaps it is through swelling numbers of human rights complaints that Canada will finally be honest about its colonial past and the Tribunal will be brave enough to imagine remedies.

Systemic remedies, cleverly crafted, will address the systemic discrimination the Caring Society complaint – among others yet to be heard – if the Tribunal is wise enough to take the opportunity before it and can harness enough humility draw Indigenous Peoples in as partners, Kelowna Accord roundtable style. To oversee implementation of a more harmonious relationship, the Tribunal itself must be seized of the outcome of the Order. Though the Commission has a key role to play in hosting dialogue, the Tribunal retains the authority to expedite matters and prevent compounded abuse of process so that the merits of culturally relevant child and family services are not further delayed.

\textsuperscript{468} Lugosi, \textit{supra}, note 134.

 Indigenous Peoples are the solution to the socio-economic gap, not the problem, which is all the more relevant because denying a history of colonialism allows Canada to continue with its policy of denial. Denial of Indigenous Peoples to be able to construct and raise families in culturally appropriate way. Denial of Indigenous Peoples rights to land: deny, deny, deny. Those Seven Grandfathers may be distilled down to what it means to be decent and how we all might treat each other. They offer intercultural insight that might lead to finding a way to end Canada’s policy of denial and unravel the ongoing maintenance of the status quo through legal structures. The Grandfathers might lead us to make room for Indigenous cultures and laws.

 We are all responsible for our choices, our actions. Hummingbird’s home was on fire. Rather than tarry or argue about who is at fault and what is the best way to fix it, she set to work. Yet, the numbers of First Nation children in care exceeds the numbers of students at Indian Residential Schools and is growing. We have to get to work and douse the fire that continues to consume lives of Indigenous children and families. Together we must come to understand Debewin, and have Minaadendamowin for each other and our respective ways through Gwayakwaadiziwin. We must show Aakode'ewin when we find ways and means to address the gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians. But to achieve key milestones we will have to harness our collective Nibwaakaawin. Canada will have to acknowledge its colonialist underbelly and approach Indigenous Peoples with Dabaadendiziwin. These are big tasks but no bigger than the socio-economic gap that Canadians allow to continue every day by accepting the master narrative.
Finally, even the casual reader can quickly calculate that if there are Seven Grandfather teachings yet only five chapters and the last chapter focused on two of those Grandfathers, one was missed. I intentionally left the seventh because though one Grandfather leads to another, there is one that comes at the very end (or the very beginning or somewhere along the way or all along the way – those Grandfathers can be tricky). It is, of course, Zaagi'idiwin. This is the Grandfather that will keep us all together, which whether we like it or not is where we find ourselves. As then Chief Justice Lamer wrote in Delgamuukw\(^{469}\) , “Let us face it. We are all here to stay.”\(^{470}\) As seen with Elder Joseph’s testimony, Indigenous Peoples already have legal orders that regulate family and children; already place children central to the universe; are already possessed of a rich understanding of collective and individual responsibility toward each child. Elder Joseph reminds us that every person, every child matters and we must show them Zaagi'idiwin. Enough time has passed.

For my part, I strive to be hummingbird and respect those Seven Grandfathers in everything I do. Admittedly, sometimes I am weary and just want to walk around the lake looking for a fresh start. Other times I am so overwhelmed I just want to sit and wait, ready to be rebuild from whatever is left over after all the consuming is done. On my very worst days, I wonder if I might be Fire and take too much, forgetting to be kind and make friends along the way. It is my deepest hope that out of all the contributions I have made and the ones I still hope to make, that I will live very few days as Fire and many more as hummingbird, doing everything that I can.

Hai-hai. All my relations.

\(^{469}\) Delgamuukw, supra, note 445.
\(^{470}\) Ibid.
BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

Coulthard G.S., Red Skin, White Masks: Rejecting the Colonial Politics of Recognition (Minneapolis, MN, USA: University of Minnesota Press), 2014

Hatton, O.T., "In the Tradition: Grass Dance Musical Style and Female Pow-wow Singers," Ethnomusicology (1986), 197-222.

Johnson, P., Native Children and the Child Welfare System (Toronto: Canadian Council on Social Development, 1983)

Mendelson, M., Aboriginal Peoples and Postsecondary Education in Canada, Caledon Institute of Social Policy, (July 2006).

Roach, K., The Supreme Court on Trial: Judicial Activism or Democratic Dialogue (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2001).

SECONDARY SOURCES

Hopkins, J., and A. Peeling “Aboriginal Judicial Appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada” prepared for the Indigenous Bar Association, 2006, http://www.indigenousbar.ca/pdf/Aboriginal%20Appointment%20to%20the%20Supreme%20Court%20Final.pdf.

House of Commons, Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, Evidence, 40th Parl., 3rd Sess., No. 56 (February 8, 2011), testimony of Mary Polak, Minister of Children and Family Development, Governments of British Columbia.

LEGISLATION, TREATIES & INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

Bill C-51, (Anti-terrorism Act, 2015).

Charter of English liberties granted by King John on June 15, 1215.

Employment Equity Act, S.C 1995, c 44.

Royal Proclamation, 1763.

CASES & TRIBUNAL DOCUMENTS

CASES

Aurelio Cal v. Belize, Supreme Court of Belize (Claims No. 171 and 172 of 2007) (Oct 18, 2007).

Beckman v. Little Salmon Carmacks First Nation, [2010], SCR 103.

Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2012 FC 445.

Canada (Attorney General) v. Mossop, [1993] 1 SCR 554 at 615.

Chaoulli v Quebec (AG) 1 S.C.R. 791, 2005 SCC 35.

Courtois v. Canada (Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development), [1991] 1 C.N.L.R. 40 (CHRT).

Grassy Narrows First Nation v. Ontario (Natural Resources), 2014 SCC 48.

Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Minister of Justice) [2000] 2 SCR 1120.

McIvor v. The Registrar, Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, 2007 BCSC 827.

Moulton Contracting Ltd. v. British Columbia, 2013 BSCS 2348 (Moulton), rev’d 2015 BCCA 89.

R. v Brosig, [1944] 2 DLR 232, 83 CCC 199.

Rio Tinto Alcan Inc. v. Carrier Sekani Tribal Council, [2010], SCR 650.

Sharon Donna McIvor and Charles Jacob Grismer v. Registrar, Indian and Northern Affairs Canada and Attorney General of Canada, 2009 CanLII 61383 (SCC).

CARING SOCIETY COMPLAINT DOCUMENTS

Closing Submissions of Respondents, First Nations Child and Family Caring Society, Assembly of First Nations.

Closing Submission of Canadian Human Rights Commission.

Dr. Blackstock cross-examination by Canada on her affidavit in support of the complaint, on February 23, 2010.

Notice of Motion, the Attorney General of Canada (representing the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), an Order to dismiss the complaint, December 21, 2009, File No. T-1753-08.

Notice of Motion of Respondent (Canada) for an Order to dismiss the Complaint, File No. T1340/7008.

Testimony of Dr. John Milloy, Transcript Vol. 33.

Testimony of Dr. John Malloy, Transcript Volume 35.